When you are very ready to talk and have much to say of the season's fashions, and your newest furniture and dresses; when you can fill the hours with the review of your neighbor's faults and follies but are silent on every topic relating to your Savior and the spiritual interests of others—this to an eye that can discern it, is a token that the grass is grown over your path. When your pastor finds he preaches you to sleep every Sabbath morning, who were full of wide-awake interest to his feeblest sermon last spring, he silently suspects that your path is grass-grown.

When your children find you ready and harsh with rebuke, unfaithful to your promises, testy and full of intemperate authority, they can testify that the grass covers your path; they know that you only read the Bible on Sundays, that you have given up family worship, and that the only voice of prayer they have any witness of, is the hasty grace at meals. When your clerks see you crabbed and grasping, the poor find you hard and unmerciful, the struggling find you selfish and worldly-wise, and each goes his way, saying, "Pretty christian!" does not your conscience point you to the hidden, neglected path?

Believe it, backsliding professor; not only God and angels, but friends and neighbors, whether old or young, can readily tell when you neglect or when you are treading daily faithful steps to the closet of fervent prayer; then you carry heaven about in your words and aspect. Oh, take down again your closed Bible; pray that its dull pages may be illuminated, its lifeless story vivified. Persevere; and "then shall you know, if you follow on to know the Lord." Place your wandering feet once more in the path of prayer, and with steady perseverance tread down the weeds that have hidden it. The invitation is ready: "Return unto me, and I will return unto you, saith the Lord." Most of all, remember that while you are neglecting duty, hundreds are passing you daily, who witness no works in you which glorify your Father, but only the constant reproach of your grass-grown path.—Independent.

Why will ye Die?

BY VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

Dear sinner, hast thou weighed this matter well—
This great salvation? Is it settled? Tell
If, with a fearless spirit, thou canst brook
The future? Hast thou seen within God's book
What thou hast scorned, and all which thou hast lost,
And what this gen'rous plan a God hath cost?

Oh, is there not reserved some hidden spring,
That might be reached by mercy's brooding wing?
Is thy heart steeled? Is there no tender spot
Can yet be touched by gratitude—a thought
Unselfish? Is it nothing Christ has done,
And is his blood so cheap—God's blessed Son?

Hast thou no dark hours, when even future things
Put on a dress they have not worn—when springs
That cheered thy heart seem to grow strangely dry,
And what has fed thee yields thee no supply?
When all thy pastures seem to thee less green,
Till scarce a star or sunny spot is seen?

If just a glimpse of stern reality—
If just one thought of future destiny
Can take from thee thy joy a moment here,
Or glean perchance the tribute of a tear,
What will it be the truth to realize,
When no kind star shall light despairing skies?
When mercy's dove, grown weary, folds her wing,
And far from thee shall take her flight to sing?

Pause but once more!—aye, pause before you drink
From that sweet chalice; see that fearful brink
That lies beneath thee; then, if thou will drain
Its poisoned waters, and with frenzied brain
Rush to thy fate, then with the angels I
Will weep to see so rich a jewel lie
In broken fragments, beautiful but lost—
A gem obscured that Jesus' blood has cost.

For the Crisis.

The Third Prophetic Day is the Sign of the Resurrection and the end of the World, or Age.

"Come, and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. After two days will he revive us; in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord: his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth."—Hosea 6: 1, 2, 3. The first thing we shall notice in this passage will be the three prophetic days. Some have supposed that each day represented a thousand years, and others that each day stood for a dispensation. These views would make those prophecies which speak of a third day of small importance, so far as light to the church is concerned. The third day—as well as the third year—is referred to as a sign of darkness, and to the other a sign of light.

"And he said unto them that sold doves, Take these things hence; make not my Father's house a house of merchandise. And his disciples remembered that it was written, The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up. Then answered the Jews, and said unto him, What sign showest thou unto us, seeing that thou doest these things? Jesus answered and said unto them, Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days?"—John 2: 16–20. Prophecy has often a primary and secondary fulfillment. It is so in the passage before us. Christ, whom they were to destroy, is only spoken of in scriptures as the chief Corner Stone of the temple. When this prophecy has its primary fulfillment, all the stones will come together, like Solomon's temple, without the sound of a hammer. Then the sign of Christ's authority for cleansing the temple will be made manifest to the wicked by the resurrection of the dead.

"The same day there came certain of the Pharisees, saying unto him, Get thee out, and depart hence; for Herod will kill thee. And he said unto them, Go ye and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected."—Luke 13: 31, 32. The church is said to be "members of Christ's body, of his flesh and of his bones," and while one of his members suffers, this scripture, in the absolute sense, cannot be fulfilled; so that it remains to be fulfilled on the third day, at the resurrection of the whole body of Christ.

"And when the people were gathered thick together, he began to say, This is an evil generation; they seek a sign, and there shall no sign be given it, but the sign of Jonas the prophet. For as Jonas was a sign unto the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation."—Luke 11: 29, 30. The sign of Jonah in the whale's belly was perfect darkness to the Ninevites; so was the resurrection of Christ, the third day, to that generation, and so will be the sign of the three days, or years, to the wicked of this generation. We have clear evidence, both from the law and the prophets, that these three days must be symbols of three years, and that they are given as a sign to the church at the end of this dispensation, when the Lord "will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight." We shall now notice a few places where the third year is referred to.

"And if ye shall say, What shall we eat the seventh year? behold, we shall not sow nor gather in our increase: Then I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years. And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat of the fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in ye shall eat of the old store."—Lev. 25: 20–22. In this portion of the law there is a very clear type, showing the resurrection of the dead to be in the third year. At the end of the sixth year the Jews began the Sabbath of their land. Every fifty years this Sabbath was followed by a jubilee. The sixth year produced sufficient fruit to last till the ninth, when the land brought forth her new fruit. This shadows forth the resurrection of the dead the year after the jubilee which is the third year.

"And this shall be a sign unto thee, Ye shall eat this year such things as grow of themselves, and in the second year that which springeth of the same; and in the third year sow ye, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruits thereof."—Isa. 37: 30. This sign, which the prophet gave to Hezekiah, had nothing to do with the victory over the Assyrian army at that time, as the angel, during the same night, slew 185,000. The first testimony is from the law, which shows the resurrection to be in the year after the jubilee. This last is from the prophet Isaiah, which proves the same thing, viz., that the resurrection follows the jubilee, when the daughter of Zion will have the victory over the fruit of the stout heart of the king of Assyria. Malachi says, "Bring all the tithes into the storehouse, and prove me therewith, if I will not open the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room to receive."

We shall see that the law required the Jews to bring all their tithes in every third year. "At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates."—Deut. 14: 28. "When thou hast made an end of tithing all the tithes of thy increase the third year, which is the year of tithing, and hast given it unto the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, that they may eat within thy gates, and be filled."—Deut. 26: 12. The first ripe sheaf of the harvest, under the law, was always waved on the third day after the lamb was slain, which marked the day that the first fruits of them that slept should rise from the dead. The Lord has selected the fruits of the earth to shadow forth the resurrection of the dead, and that to the definite day. The tithe was a tenth that was offered to the Lord, and it was required to be the best of all their fruits. This represents the good of every age, who are the Lord's tithe.

"For this Mischisdec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that King of Salem, which is, King of peace."—Heb. 7: 1, 2. Before Sodom was destroyed, Abraham pleaded with the Lord to spare that city. This he agreed to do if ten righteous men, (which was the Lord's tithe) could be found within its limits; when this could not be found, he ceased pleading.

When the time came for this message to go forth, ten virgins were called, with their lamps in their hands, to make the solemn proclamation; this was a tithe out of this age of fashionable Christianity. But note, when the third year has come, the time in which to bring all the tithes into the storehouse, we, like Sodom, are left with only a tenth, out of this vast amount of profession, as an offering to the Lord. We see, from the testimony before us, that the law shadows forth the year after the jubilee, when the new fruits come in, as the point for the resurrection. The law also appoints the third year as the time to bring in all the tithes, which represent the good of every age, to be brought unto the Lord at the resurrection of the just. We have noticed how definitely the first offering of fruits was fulfilled, in the resurrection of Christ; and I have no doubt, if we only understand the Lord's arrangements under the gospel, we shall see that the fruits mark as definitely the resurrection of the whole church.

The next point will be to prove when we come to the third year, which is the year of the Lord's redeemed. Our first testimony on this point will be from the law. It would avail but little if the law pointed out the third year for the resurrection, and furnished no light to the church by which she might know when that year arrived. If the Jews had fully understood the law and the prophets, they would have known the exact day that Christ should rise from the dead. It is abundantly proved by the prophets that, prior to the second coming of Christ, there would be trumpets of alarm sounded, and that this land, shadowing with wings, is the place from which the sound is to go forth, that all nations are commanded to hear. The shadows of these trumpets are found in the law, which shows that two trumpets were sounded—one upon the first day of the seventh month, the other on the tenth day of the same month. Our Lord says, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." These trumpets are a portion of the law, and were to be fulfilled, according to the testimony of the prophets, before the dreadful day of the Lord, that every man's blood should be upon his own head if he rejected the warning. In 1844, there was a trumpet sounded in this land that was heard to the uttermost parts of the earth. The time appointed for the coming of the Lord in this trumpet was the tenth day of the seventh month in that year. This was the point where all hearts and eyes were fixed, and all voices sounded the same note of alarm. The first trumpet under the law was blown at the beginning of the first day of the seventh month, on the sight of the new moon, which appeared in the evening, the time the Jews always began their day. "Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day."—Ps. 81: 3.

The second trumpet under the law was sounded on the tenth day of the seventh month. This trumpet was not like the former, which was blown at the first sight of the new moon, but differed inasmuch as there was no particular point in the tenth day for the trumpet to sound. It is therefore presumable that it included the whole of the tenth day, which would make ten full days inclusive between these two trumpets. The antitype behind us agrees perfectly with the type. In 1854 the second trumpet of alarm was sounded. There was no point in the year fixed for the coming of Christ in any preaching, as it was in the former trumpet; but the event was looked for throughout the whole year. These two trumpets included just ten years, from the fall of '44 to the fall of '54, which fulfilled the law to the letter, (reckoning a day,) without any design on the part of those who fulfilled it. The fifth day after the second trumpet in the law had sounded, was the first day of the feast of tabernacles. This feast was introduced with no trumpet, but with a time of rejoicing. The types of the seventh month were designed to shadow forth the movements of the church before the second coming of Christ. It is evident that all the days, from the first day of the seventh month to the last day of the feast of tabernacles, are symbols of years. We have two ways of arriving at this fact; one is, the fulfillment of the trumpets in ten years behind us proves it; the other is that these fall types have connected with them a third year for the resurrection of the church, in the same manner as the passover under the law had a third day for the resurrection of the first fruits. What the passover was to them, the feast of tabernacles is to us, so that the third year of this feast brings the resurrection, which proves all the days connected with the fall types to be shadows of years.

From the second trumpet in 1854, five years carry us to 1859. This was the first year, according to the law, of the feast of tabernacles, which was a Sabbatical year; and the year following was the jubilee. Therefore the third year in this feast brings the resurrection of the dead, as the third day marked the resurrection of the first fruits at the feast of the passover.

We shall see that the prophetic periods are in harmony with the law, all terminating at the beginning of these three prophetic days. The 2300 and 1335 days are both connected with the sanctuary and the daily sacrifice. The first began when the church came out of literal Babylon and restored the sanctuary and daily sacrifice; the second when the church went into mystical Babylon and had her daily sacrifice taken away and the place of the sanctuary cast down. It will be seen by reading the sixth chapter of Ezra, that the daily sacrifice was restored and the sanctuary dedicated at the passover, where also the 69 weeks begin and ended. There is strong presumptive evidence that the first portion of the seventy weeks began with a sabbatical year prior to the jubilee. Seven weeks are 49 years, the period which elapses between those sabbatical years connected with the jubilee. The inference is, that the 2300 days began with a sabbatical year, and would of necessity end where they began, as there are 46 even jubilees in 2300 years. At the end of a prophetic period of 430 years, on the self-same day the Lamb was slain, all the host of Israel left Egypt. When they had made two encampments, on the morning of the third day, they had the shadow of a resurrection from the Red Sea. The same season of the year the church dedicated her new sanctuary, and restored the daily sacrifice, where also the 2300 days began. At the end of another period of 483 years, the Lamb of God was slain, and three days after (like the coming out of Egypt) there was a resurrection of the dead, fulfilling the first fruits of them that slept. By this resurrection, God has appointed the third day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness. The evidence that has been published, proving the 2300 days to end in 1859, is irrefutable. The great point in this argument is the total eclipse in A. D. 19. This eclipse, according to the testimonies of several eminent historians, occurred at the death of Augustus Cæsar. He was succeeded by Tiberius in August, A. D. 19, who reigned 22 years and six months. At the end of his reign our Lord was crucified, which brings the cross to A. D. 42, and the end of the 2300 days to 1859. This brings the church in 1859 to the beginning of the three days, or years, like the 430 years coming out of Egypt, and also the 483 years at the cross, both being shadows of the final deliverance of God's people.

The evidence on the 1335 days, beginning in 524, depends upon two points. First, what sect held the truth that was cast down by the little horn? The Pope, by his influence over the civil governments, obtained the destruction of three Arian kingdoms, viz., the Vandals, the Ostrogoths, and the Burgundyans, which is proof in itself that the Arians held the truth and were the true church. Farthermore, we cannot find a sect on the pages of history that was not carried away with the mystic system of interpretation, except the Arians. They nobly stood up for the truth of the restitution, as we hold it, and denied that the Father and the Son were composed of one divine essence, without body, parts, or passions, as the other sects believed. The second point is, what we are to understand by the holy place, or sanctuary, from which the daily sacrifice was taken away, and which was polluted by an armed force. Prophecy makes a clear distinction between the holy place, or sanctuary, and the church. The little horn cast down some of the host and stars to the ground, and tramped upon them. These symbols (host and stars) mean the ministry and people of God. This same little horn took away the daily sacrifice, and cast down the place of his sanctuary. The "casting down of the sanctuary," in Dan. 8: 11, is synonymous with the "polluting of the sanctuary," in Dan. 11: 31. There is no room to doubt that the sanctuary, or holy place under the law, is the same thing under the gospel, viz., a place dedicated for the worship of God, and the daily sacrifice is the exhortation and prayer which was offered daily in the sanctuary. The instruction of our Lord, in Matt. 24: 15, is important on this point. "When ye, therefore, see the abomination of desolation standing where it ought not, (or in the holy place,) whoso readeth let him understand." When this power stood in the holy place, it was an event that could be seen and understood by the church, because it was then she was commanded to flee to the mountains. The holy place must have been a place occupied by a holy people, or the true church of God, who held the truth that was cast down to the ground by the little horn. This was done in A. D. 524, when, by the force of arms, the Arians were deprived of all their churches, and were consecrated anew by the Catholic bishops, which was an event that could be seen and understood by the people of God. Some have supposed that this was done in 525, when the Pope was sent to Constantinople to put a stop to the persecution of the Arians. While there, history informs us that he was conducted to the great Catholic church, and there performed divine service in the Latin tongue. This was a Catholic church before the Pope went there, and it was a Catholic church after he left. He neither cast it down nor polluted it, (any more than it was before,) [illegible] How, I ask, could the church then understand such a fulfillment of Matt. 24: 15, and Mark 3: 14, as this? Our Lord's predictions were fulfilled to the letter in 524, which brings the 1335 days to A. D. 1859, where, also, the trumpets in the law bring us. The 2300 days end at the same place, which brings us to the first year of the feast of tabernacles, in the third year of which is the resurrection of the dead.

We have a most striking analogy between the fall of literal Babylon and the deliverance of the church the third year after, and the fall of mystical Babylon, and the deliverance that follows the third year also. From the testimony of Jer. 25: 11, 12, and Dan. 9, it is very evident that the 70 years ended when Babylon fell, which was in the first year of Darius the Mede. He reigned but two years, and the church was delivered in the first year of Cyrus, that is, the third year after the fall of Babylon. We have shown that the period which measures the whole length of the domineering power of mystical Babylon ended in 1859. In that year came her plagues—death, mourning and famine—and she now awaits her last, to be utterly burned with fire. Since this time she could not say, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow," for her sorrows came when the power of Austria was broken in Italy, and her beloved husband was separated from her. She fell like her prototype, as a sign of the church's deliverance the third year following. The Jews began their days in the evening, and the resurrection of the first fruits of the harvest, took place about the middle of the third day. The trumpets in the law bring us to the passover (where the sabbatical year began) for the beginning of these three days. It is there also where the prophetic periods end; the middle of the third year from this point will come at the feast of tabernacles this present year.

We are compelled to believe that our Lord has furnished light upon the season of his coming, as well as the year, for the benefit of his people. We cannot enter into proofs on all points, owing to our limited space. The evidences which have been brought out respecting the season of the year when the Jews kept their feasts, are all doubtful. We cannot rely on any class of Jews, or travellers in Judea, to settle this question. When the church received the commission to carry the gospel to all nations, she did not teach them to observe the Jewish feasts. Paul speaks of them in Col. 2: 14–16 as ordinances, that were taken out of the way and nailed to the cross. This land is the place marked out in Prophecy from which the light on this truth was to go forth. Here the celestial signs have been clearly developed. These signs were given to us in answer to the question, "What shall be the sign of thy coming and the end of the world?" There is a definite sign spoken of, both in the law and the prophets, and also by our Lord, which is, the resting of the land for two years, or the time Jesus rested in the grave. We would have no means of knowing when these three days or years began which are the sign of Christ's coming, except our Lord has answered the question of his disciples, "What shall be the sign of thy coming?" The sun was darkened at a full moon when Jesus suffered on the cross. On the 19th of May, after the church had passed through her tribulation, at a full moon it was darkened again. If this darkening of the sun (May 19th) marks the passover, the feast of tabernacles will fall on the 12th or 13th of November. We shall quote from Prof. Olmstead to show that the falling stars, in ten different years, have marked definitely the feast of tabernacles. He, after commenting on the falling stars on the 13th of November, 1833, says:—

"A similar phenomenon was witnessed on the 12th of November, 1799, and at the same season of the year in 1830, 1831 and 1832. The meteoric shower was repeated on the morning of November 13th, or 14th, for several years, but on a scale constantly diminishing until 1838."

Here then we have the fact, that the stars fell no less than ten times, in fulfillment of the Scriptures, from the 13th to the 14th of November, since the darkening of the sun in 1780.

We have condensed the testimony in order to get the different points into a narrow compass. All we can say respecting the argument is, that we believe it to be the truth; that the feast of tabernacles this present year, marked by the falling of the stars, will bring what we have been looking for these many years, and nothing but the passing of this time can change my faith.

For the Crisis.

"God gave Me to this Home."

A friend, who loves the little ones,
Came to our house one day,
And won betimes each boyish heart,
Well versed in sportive play.

We boast six healthful, noble boys—
They make glad sunshine here;
Willie, the youngest pet of all,
Seemed to our guest most dear.

"You have your share of earthly joy,"
Said this good friend to me;
"Pray, spare me one my heart to cheer,
With childish, winsome glee.

Willie would like to be my boy,
We'd ride out every day;
Toys of all kinds should then be his—
What is your answer, say?"

The boy looked up in rapt surprise,
While brothers crowded near;
Fearing their darling one to lose,
The mother dropped a tear.

"No, sir," he said, in accents sweet,
"I cannot leave my mother;
Besides, God gave me to this home,
And not to any other."

AMY.

For the Crisis.

"Duty at the Present Time."

How important the time in which we live! What a fearful responsibility rests upon those who profess to be looking for the immediate coming of the Lord. And how great the necessity of their being identified with present truth, and taking a decided stand for it, in order to separate them from the world, and to be found giving meat in due season when the Lord cometh. The controversy between God and man is to be brought to a close with this generation. In Luke 21: 25, and on, the Lord declares certain things shall take place. The first are the signs; and when the persons who were to see them do behold them, they see the beginning of these things. We pass down the stream of time a little further, and we come to distress of nations, etc. And when those who saw the beginning see these things in the nations, he says this generation shall not pass till all be fulfilled. The books to be opened, and every man to be judged out of those things written in the books, according to their works. The saints of God who have lived and died in past generations, could not lift up their heads and look up, knowing that their redemption was nigh, even at the door. The sure word of prophecy had not revealed to them the evidence to show that such was the fact. They knew according to the word that they must lie down till the heavens be no more. They knew that, if they believed in Jesus Christ, although they might die, yet should they live again, for he will raise them up at the last day. They knew that the kingdom of God would come, although they would not live to see it. They knew all this by faith in his word, and they knew just as assuredly, by the same word, that the prophecy to be fulfilled in the last generation had not then had its fulfillment.

Says Jesus, "whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die." And those saints who are to be among that number who shall never die, but be changed in a moment, at the sound of the last trump, are not left without some evidence from the sure word of prophecy to assure them of that fact. The opening of the sixth seal (Rev. 6th) unfolds to the view of the saints of God signs and events to occur which are proof positive to this fact. These are the last tokens of warning to the waiting church and an ungodly world, to urge them to escape the wrath to come. The darkening of the sun, the moon to become as blood, the stars of heaven to fall as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, have been fulfilled, according to the prophecy. Says Jesus, (Luke 21: 25, etc.,) "After these signs upon the earth, there shall be distress of nations with perplexity, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth." These words of our blessed Lord are now being fulfilled. All classes, from the most degraded and illiterate to those who occupy the highest positions of worldly honor, are, in their eagerness to learn those things that are coming on the earth, almost forgetful of the past; all are fearful, all are interested to know. The nations are already beginning to totter, and are ready to fall, drunken and mad, thirsting for blood, evil disposed one to the other, (Jer. 25), racked with internal commotions, because of the sword that the Lord has sent among them.

The mighty wheel of prophecy cannot be delayed by the doubting and fearful, who question the present fulfillment of this prophecy by saying all things continue as they were from the beginning. This very class are contributing mightily to the faithful servants, [illegible] to show that the end is nigh, even at the door. Says Jesus, "And then shall they see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." That is, while these events are in progress, suddenly the Son of man will be revealed. The precise day and hour we are not to know; but the generation that behold the celestial signs, and witness this distress and perplexity of nations, shall not pass till all be fulfilled. These are the words of the Lord, and he says, "He that rejecteth my words, the same shall judge him in the last day." Says Jesus, "When ye see the fulfillment of these words of mine, know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand." What now distinguishes the servant of God from the world is, his being identified with present truth, and his love for that truth manifested to those around by his daily life and conversation. Says Peter, (2d Epistle 3: 14,) "Wherefore, Beloved, seeing ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless."

Brethren, we are looking for the kingdom of God to come quickly, and says Jesus, "I have chosen you out of the world." And a firm belief in the words of Jesus, spoken with reference to this generation, those words particularly adapted to our time, received in the love of the truth, separates us from the world. Who are receiving this truth in the love of it? It becomes each one to ask himself, or herself, am I receiving it, or am I rejecting it? Those who receive not the love of the truth, God will send a strong delusion, that they might believe a lie. (2 Thess. 2: 8–12.) The truth is, we are in close proximity to the time when the heavens will depart as a scroll; the wicked and unbelieving on the earth will soon call for rocks and mountains to fall on them, to hide them from the wrath of the Lamb, and from the face of him that sitteth on the throne. "This generation shall not pass till all be fulfilled."

In view of these awfully solemn and impressive truths, so soon to be realized by every one, will any of the little flock who have been looking for and expecting the Lord to come, now that we are being tested by the scenes which are to try this generation, (Dan. 12: 10) remain silent, and appear indifferent with regard to these great events, and thus virtually say, my Lord delayeth his coming? Will they thus smite their fellow servants by following afar off, like Peter when he denied his Lord? Has not the influence of the deceiving spirits (Rev. 16: 13, 14,) which go forth to gather the whole world to the battle of that great day of God Almighty, imperceptibly crept over them? It is now, if ever, that the influence of these spirits can be discerned winding their deadly coils around (if it were possible) the very elect, and thus drag them to perdition. The world says (of the evil servant) why this is one of the believers in the second coming of the Lord, and he says, (or the deceiving spirit leads him to say), "I don't believe that the end is so near, as some of them believe; it will come sometime, but I don't believe it will come yet." Now mark the language of our Lord; the unbelieving servant does not say my Lord never will come, but he delayeth his coming. He may remain silent upon this great truth; be all engaged in the news of the day, eager to know if our side has been victorious; talks with the world about the trouble that now agitates this nation, ready at all times to enter into conversation about these things, but neglects to warn them to prepare to meet their God, and thus strengthen them in their belief that it will not come.

Oh, the responsibility resting upon those who profess to believe in the second coming of the Saviour! Oh, brethren, do not become filled with the spirit of the world. If we should see a person who had a friend in whom he professed to put implicit confidence, to love and respect, and that friend had been absent for a long time, and when the news came that he was coming soon, and the news of his coming came direct from that friend, should we not think his profession of respect and love a false one if, as the time drew near, he should become indifferent, and say he did not believe he was coming, and occupy his attention almost wholly with other things? Cast not away your confidence, brethren, for it hath great recompense of reward. Hold on, brother, sister, yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and he will not tarry. Says Jesus, in view of the scenes through which the church are now passing, "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things [illegible] 21: 36. [illegible] my Lord delayeth his coming. [illegible] back. Let us not be of the number that draw back, but that believe and endure to the end. The faithful servant is found giving meat in due season when his Lord cometh. He says the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. I believe it; I love this blessed truth, and I want others to believe. Soon the prayer, Thy kingdom come, will be answered. Soon the Son of man will come in the glory of his Father, and then shall he sit on the throne of his glory; then will he say to those faithful servants, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Do we want to be of that number? Then let us be found among the servants to be called blessed; found giving meat in due season—"present truth"; be among the number who know that they shall see the Son of man before this generation passes away—really glad of it—love it. We shall not be in doubt to know our duty. This truth, these words of our Lord (Luke 21 : 31) inspire us with confidence, received, and the love of them separates us from the world. Here, then, is our duty; here our position; and the glorious prospect just ahead—the meeting of friends now on earth, the meeting of those dead in Christ to part no more, is indeed glorious. Yes, the dead saints are to come forth to die no more. The living saints are not to be alone in the jubilee. No, no. Those who have been laid away in the cold grave, torn from the friends they loved, will burst the bands of death at the sound of the voice of the Son of God. Bless the Lord, in that bright morn the last tear will have been shed, the last good bye will have been spoken. Funeral scenes and garments of mourning, grave yards and the burial of friends, will not be remembered nor come into mind. That little child, in all its innocency and beauty, snatched from the tender care of a mother's love; that brother, with whom so many happy hours have been spent; that sister, whose kind warnings and entreaties linger around the hearts of friends remaining; that mother, whose object in life was to make her family happy and cheerful, and instil into their youthful hearts a practical knowledge of those truths necessary to insure to them a part in the glory to be revealed; that father, who has been the support and stay of the family, and on whom they leaned, and whose good advice, in the Lord, led them to love and cherish his memory as sacred, will yet live, and join the company of living saints. They will yet look just as blooming and glorious as those who have never died. And they will shout, yes, shout, "Oh! death, where is thy sting? Oh! grave, where is thy victory? But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

Do you want to see that sweet babe, that sister, that brother, that mother, that father, and live with them forever? Then do not say now my Lord delayeth his coming. The servant who is found giving meat in due season when his Lord cometh, is sure to enjoy this glorious scene now at the doors. But the servant who, by silence and indifference on the momentous issues hanging upon the time in which we are now living, says to the world my Lord delayeth his coming, and would, were the question put to him, Will the Lord find faith on the earth when he cometh? be compelled to answer, for my part, I don't know. He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved. Brethren, the positive assurance from the sure word that we are to meet Jesus and all the family ere this generation passes away, gives us every encouragement to endure to the end. Just a little while and the conflict will close. May the Lord help all of the dear brethren, is the prayer of the writer. Amen.

For the Crisis.

Maine State Mission.

Since our Annual Conference in Yarmouth, in September, my time has been occupied in moving my family and settling them at Yarmouth, preaching the word where Providence and duty called, and in obtaining subscriptions to our State Mission. September 22d, I preached two discourses in West Poland, which closed my labors in that place. Our evening meeting was one of good interest, the Lord aiding us in the preaching of his word at this our closing service. We bade adieu the following week to our brethren and sisters in that region, who had greatly endeared themselves to us, in our residence among them, by the many kindnesses shown us, and the christian fellowship we had enjoyed.

I have just attended two quarterly Conferences in the western and central part of our State. The first, held Oct. 10th, and over the Sabbath, in Kennebunkport; the other in Wayne, held the 17th inst., and over the Lord's day. These meetings were excellent, though many of our brethren and sisters were hindered from coming up to these spiritual feasts by the inclemency of the weather. Both meetings began with a north-easterly storm, which continued, with but little intermission, up to Sunday; yet the spirit and presence of the Lord made up for the absence of brethren and sisters and the affliction of the storm.

At Kennebunkport we were not favored with the presence of those preaching brethren we anticipated seeing there, with the exception of Eld. Mitchell who resides at K. Eld. Hoptell, however, came on unexpectedly, and did us good service in cheering our hearts with his goodly words of counsel. Bro. Prescott, also, who lives near by, favored us with his presence, and preached a good discourse on Sunday morning. The church expected Eld. Couch, agreeably to his appointment on Sunday, but in this they and we were disappointed, as he was unable to reach the place in time, owing to a change of cars, of which he was not apprised. But, amid all these things that appeared against us, God was with us, blessing us in our meetings. On the Lord's day we had a complete breaking and melting down under the power of the truth, as nearly all, if not the whole congregation, were in tears; so that our meetings closed satisfactorily to all. Bro. Mitchell informed me personally that he himself had been greatly benefitted by the meetings, and felt assured his brothers and sisters had been. This church did nobly for our State Mission, and took hold of the work heartily and in good earnest, setting an example for other churches and isolated brethren to follow. The subscriptions, donations and collections amounted to about $50—and there are some yet to aid us. The Lord reward them for their liberality. I expect to hear of good and lasting results from this our meeting, among those without, who listened so attentively to the word. May the seed be watered and spring up to glorify God.

Our Conference in Wayne was attended by Elders Seavey, Hackett, Hanscomb, Lombard and Dudley. Brethren Seavey and Hackett are quite ill, and unable to preach as formerly, but they aided us much by their presence, prayers and exhortations. Considering the raging storm which prevailed up to Sunday, quite a number of brethren and sisters were present from a distance. This meeting has been isolated from numbers of those of "like precious faith", but the citizens in the region were interested to care for our temporal convenience, and benevolently opened their doors, and kindly and hospitably entertained us throughout the meeting. This resulted in our mutual benefit and christian enjoyment. Those who thus entertained us, and who attended on our Conference, became impressed in a good measure of the truth of our doctrines and hope, and some so expressed themselves to us before leaving. At our communion season, on Sabbath morning, several of other denominations partook with us of the emblems of a Saviour's dying love. On parting with this hospitable people, they expressed a great desire for us to return again among them at no distant day, and preach to them the word of life. At the close of our evening service, a gentleman three miles distant came and desired me to accompany him to his home, to tarry the night with his family, and informed me that he would carry me the next day to the depot, to take cars for home, a distance of five miles. I complied with his request, and took up with his offer, and had the privilege of conversing with him, by the way, upon the subject of my evening discourse, and on arrival at his home, we sat up until near midnight, conversing upon the things of the kingdom of God. In the morning, after a good breakfast at his table, and a holy season of prayer around his christian altar, I was conveyed to the cars for home, rejoicing that an effectual door is opened for me to preach the word in all parts of the State, through the liberality of my beloved brethren.

I would here add, in conclusion, that our brethren are feeling well about our mission. This is evidenced by the willingness to do something for the mission, and the personal expressions to me. A brother in Waterford said to me, "Bro. Fassett, there is order in this; I like it;" and subscribed $5 to aid our mission, and his wife contributed also. A brother in Lewiston, who has subscribed among the largest donors, and whose name I would be glad to mention if he would allow, was greatly pleased with our plan, and remarked that "he had seen nothing that appeared so effective as this." It pleased him well. Such is the universal feeling; and we have large hopes in the success and efficiency of our mission beyond our highest anticipations. May the Lord prosper us. A brother in Worcester, a native of our State, leads the way in this enterprise, and we, as residents, must not be behind in our efforts to awaken our fellow men to the importance of our faith and hope. There may be others out of the State who would be glad to aid us, in this their native State; if so, let them address me, or any one of our Committee—I. C. Wellcome, Richmond, Me., R. Harley, Bro. Hackett, or Geo. Humphrey, of Yarmouth. The brethren in the State should respond without a call, and we expect they will when we do call upon them in person. Remember, the object of our "State Mission" is to spread the truth, by preaching and publications, in all and especially destitute regions of our State,—that we want two or more missionaries in the field, if possible, who will give themselves wholly to their work. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, and it will be "laying up in store a good foundation against the time to come"—interest in heaven, and a treasure there enduring as eternity. 'Tis time we all awake. The day of the Lord is near, it hasteth greatly.

The World's Crisis.
BOSTON, OCTOBER 30, 1861.

Parting Words.

When I came to this city last April to attend the Conference, nothing could have been farther from my thoughts than the idea of being invited to become Editor of the Crisis. Plans had but just been matured by which my residence was to be transferred from Albany to Hartford, where I had been laboring during the previous six months. When the editorship was named to me, in connection with the business responsibilities that have accompanied it, although I looked upon the proposal with considerable favor, the question arose in my mind whether the duties to be undertaken would be compatible with the prosecution of my Sunday labors in preaching. Deciding affirmatively on this point, under the pleasant delusion that my daily pursuits as an editor would contribute directly to fit me to preach, I accepted the position, at the same time making an arrangement by which I was to spend every Lord's day in Hartford. Bro. Dickinson, of H., hinted to me in no very doubtful terms that I was undertaking too much, but of course I was too wise to be diverted from my purpose by his well intended suggestion; and to Boston I came to demonstrate how mistaken he was! When I had been at my new post a few days only, Bro. Storrs—in a letter from which an extract was published in the Crisis of May 15th—wrote me as follows: "I have little doubt you will have to quit preaching or quit editing. Your 'head' will never stand both: you will break down under it very soon. A man needs to be a giant to do both, if he does it right." With all my resolution in the premises, it required but a brief experience to convince me that my "two friends," unlike those of "the Temanite" of old, had "spoken of me the thing that is right." I found literally no leisure for meditation or study, while the exhaustion of my physical and mental energies resulting from my office labors, during the week, was such as, when Sunday came, entirely unfitted me for the duties I had assumed for that day. These Sunday appointments in turn, and the anxiety inseparable from them, deprived me of the time which should have been employed in furnishing a poorly stored mind with materials for editorial articles.

In this way the arrangement went on—each calling interfering with the demands of the other—until early in August, when I fully determined that I would "quit editing," though I deemed it expedient to postpone my resignation until the annual meeting of the Advent Christian Association. Accordingly, on reaching Worcester, week before last, I embraced the earliest opportunity, after the Association had by vote taken into its own hands the control of the Crisis, to surrender my editorship, being perfectly satisfied that fidelity to God would not permit me to "quit preaching." I should add, perhaps, that in this choice of alternatives my inclination accords entirely with what I believe to be duty.

Thus much seems proper by way of explanation. My official relation to the Crisis terminates with the present number, and the next issue of the paper will, I presume, carry to its readers words of greeting from the Editor elect, Brother Miles Grant, and his Associate, Brother P. B. Morgan. They will not, I am persuaded, be found wanting in an earnest desire, backed up by a corresponding endeavor, to meet their responsibilities faithfully; and they shall have my sympathy and co-operation in their labors just so far as they execute their trust in accordance with the just and liberal policy which the Association has prescribed for the management of the paper. As both of these brethren have endorsed the principles embodied in that policy, I will not permit myself to doubt that they will be conscientiously regarded. I am well aware, of course, that, under the operation of the policy referred to, certain views against which these columns were, until recently, hermetically sealed, will receive attention in the paper; and it is scarcely necessary for me to say that, so far from deprecating this enlargement of the Crisis "platform," I welcome the fact as one imperatively demanded by the interests of the cause at large.

Says Bro. Berick, in the Crisis of July 10th: "There is no reason why brethren differing in sentiment should not have the privilege of expressing their sentiments in a christian-like manner. It is too late in the day to undertake to stifle conviction, or prevent investigation. It is not a sufficient reason why I should reject an article simply because I believe the writer is advocating error; to do so would not only inflict a wrong upon such person, by depriving him of his right to a hearing, but it would be equally a hardship upon community, who have the same right to hear and liberty to judge that I exercise."

I shall not cease to be glad that Bro. B. used his "privilege" and placed on record such noble "sentiments" as the above. It was because I knew these to be the principles which Bro. Berick believed should govern the management of the Crisis, that I desired, on going to Worcester, to have the editorship of the paper offered to him. I am well aware that there is a point where freedom degenerates into license; at the same time experience has convinced me that it will not be very difficult for a judicious man to avoid extremes, if he has a tolerable appreciation of the rights and wants of those who are interested in the Crisis and willing to do their share in sustaining it.

It must not be supposed that my early decision to relinquish the editorial chair involves any regret on my part that I ever consented to become its occupant. The fact is far otherwise. The experience of the past six months, despite its toilsome character, has been to me a very interesting one, and I prize it highly. It has given me a knowledge of the "Advent" body at large which I could have acquired in no other way—a knowledge, not only of the leading brethren in the body, but also of its tone, doctrinally and spiritually. Memory will revert to many pleasing reminiscences in this brief editorial career.

Of the manner in which I have discharged my duties I care not to speak. Mainly, the paper has been what other pens than mine have made it. I have not been able to fill it always with such matter as seemed to me best, nor could I have done this without an unwarrantable disregard of the wishes of some whose contributions were deemed inferior to articles that might have been borrowed from various sources. But my purpose has been to do right. What has not been pleasing to the Lord in my efforts, I trust He has forgiven. My only hope is in his mercy, and my desire is to consecrate myself anew to His service. I crave the prayers of his children that my unworthy name may be found in the Lamb's book of Life in the day when he shall make up his jewels.

And now, beloved in Christ, farewell! Let us, in imitation of our divine Master, endure the cross and despise the shame, willingly counting all things loss if we may at last be found in Jesus, and "be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light." Changes incessantly occur in this the land of our pilgrimage, "for the things which are seen are temporal;" but the perfect day is drawing nigh—the fruition of an unending and glorified existence is just before us. Be it ours to quit ourselves like men, till the Lord of the vineyard in which we serve shall come to give us wages. Having our fruit unto holiness, the end will be everlasting life. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

Rufus Wendell.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

Hereafter all letters, communications, remittances and orders for the World's Crisis are to be directed to ELDER MILES GRANT, Boston, Mass.

H. L. Hastings, President C. P. S.

Glad to see him.—Just as we are going to press, we have a call from Bro. P. B. Morgan, who has been confined to his house by sickness for several weeks. His friends will be glad, as we are, to learn that he is steadily improving in health. As an editor he will need all the bodily vigor which it shall please the Lord to give him.

☞ Persons wishing to procure the work, "Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again," can send to us for it, if they desire it upon the terms of Bro. Ladd's recent offer, which is still in force. Address, with the price of the pamphlet, Rufus Wendell, Boston, Mass.

☞ The retiring Editor's address, until otherwise directed, will be—Rufus Wendell, Boston, Mass. He desires that Crisis correspondence and business matters relating to the office shall not be sent to him.

☞ Bro. C. F. Hudson will find a letter from us at Chicago, Ill., to which place also we regularly send him the Crisis.

Departing from the Faith.

We have received a copy of The Northern Independent, a Methodist paper published in Auburn, N. Y., containing an "extract" from the Fast Day Sermon of our friend Rev. L. Hartsough, on "The Sin of Political Partyism." The extract is all good, but our space will permit us only to give the following passage, in which are set forth the demoralization and unprincipled character of the political press:—

"Then mark, too, how untruthful and debased, have become a large share of the political press. How lost it is to all moral sense or shame. No matter how great a wrong, or vile a measure may be broached, it will have its abettors; and falsehoods are purposely coined, and then printed with all the assurance of the best attested truths. For instance, I read but the other day in a certain paper which has been published for twenty years, and whose editors are men of education and experience, and who knew when they wrote and published the editorial from which I quote, that this remark was utterly false. Speaking of the Missouri Compromise Line, the editor asserts that 'the North had forty years ago imposed the Missouri Line upon the South.' Twelve to fourteen years ago, I was a subscriber and constant reader of that paper, and this same editor then taught me the whole, the true history of that measure, of which Thomas H. Benton in his thirty years in the U. S. Senate, says that it was a measure forced upon the North, and reluctantly [illegible]. And yet that same editorial from which the above quotation is taken, had two others as outspoken and unmitigated falsehoods, in its first sentence, and a third and broader one implied. The second sentence asserts a baser falsehood, because if believed, it is calculated to overthrow the Government in the confidence of the people. The next column of the same paper, had an editorial on Liberty, a half column in length, with eight or nine false statements in regard to Government action, so vile that they ought to have called out the strong hand of our Government for the suppression of that particular press. It is a burning disgrace to us as a people, that patrons enough can be found to sustain a press that requires the iron hand of law to suppress."

But the degeneracy of the press which Bro. Hartsough exposes was not what we had in mind when we placed "Departing from the Faith" at the head of this article. We must expect that the dirty work of politics will be done by men whose fame shall rest on other grounds than their scrupulous regard for truth. Still, it is right to bring God's word to bear against them as is done in the sermon.

In another part of the Independent from which we have quoted is a short article headed, "Dying but a Little More," which we give entire:—

Mr. Philip Henry, in his last illness, on recovering from a fainting fit, said, "Dying is but a little more."

This is just as true of many pains which we daily suffer. Many persons, in the amputation of a limb, even in the drawing of a tooth, or in a few twinges of neuralgic pain, probably endure more physical suffering than ordinarily attends the act of dying. Our life in one sense is a perpetual death. The stock of vital force given to each of us, even in the process of growth, is expending, and therefore exhausting itself. As every ray of light emitted by the candle is a diminution of its substance—as every stroke and even tick of the clock is effected by a descent of its weights and therefore so much toward running down;—so every vital manifestation is an advance towards death.

We are dying daily. What we call death is only the end of the process, the termination of a life long mortal agony. When we know what it is really to live, "when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality," then we shall look back on this life as a continual death.

Death will be that investure. It will be a transition from a mortal to an immortal life. To die, then, is to cease to die, to have done dying, to pass into that state where they die no more, where "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain"—the sad antecedents of death, and preparation for it.

We cite this as a fair sample of the havoc made of Bible truth by the dogma of an immortal soul in man. When, according to the writer of the above, shall "we know what it is really to live"? Answer—"when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality." But the question now naturally arises, when shall "incorruption" and "immortality" be "put on"? We turn to 1 Cor. 15th chapter and learn that this "investiture" will be—1. when "the trumpet shall sound;" 2. when "the dead shall be raised;" and 3. when "death is swallowed up in victory." Elsewhere we learn that "the trump of God" is to be accompanied by "the voice of the Archangel," but the dead are to hear neither the "voice" nor the "trump" until the time when "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven." See 1 Thess. 4 : 16.

Now look at the article from the Independent and see with what facility "the truth of God is changed into a lie," by the assertion—"Death will be that investiture"! Death "will be the transition from a mortal to an immortal life"!! And when men "have done dying" they pass into the deathless, sorrowless, painless state!!! Not a hint that dead men need to live again by a resurrection in order to put on incorruption. O no! "Death" must have the glory and the resurrection become a nullity! And all this because men have deathless souls! We know individuals who will read without concern such flagrant perversions of scripture language as appears in the above article, and with the next breath denounce as infidels those who believe that "the dead know not anything" and that "if the dead rise not" we may as well "eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." We deem it matter of no small importance that Bible language which assures us of deliverance from death should be applied to our condition in death. The results of such liberties with the word of God are more pernicious than the lies of shameless politicians who scarcely expect to be believed. "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God."

A Tract for the Times.—In giving last week the title in full of Bro. Shepherd's new tract, we omitted to give the price, which is—single copies, 5 cents; 10 copies, 25 cents; 50 copies, $1.10; postage included; or in large quantities where the brethren want them for general distribution 500 copies for $5.00, Expressage included. Address Eld. William Shepherd, Newark, New Jersey.

"This," says the Editor of the Harbinger, "is an excellent little Tract. It gives a bird's eye view of all the above doctrine; and it is one, we think, that is calculated to do good, under the divine blessing. It contains near 300 references under their appropriate headings. May it have a wide circulation."

Romanism in Prayer.

"If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me."—Ps. 66 : 18.

Such is human nature; such, but by the grace of God, are we all. We must be dull inspectors of our own hearts, if we have never discerned there, lurking beneath the level at which sin breaks out into overt crime, some single offence—an offence of feeling, an offence of habit in thought, which for a time has spread its infection over the whole character of our devotions. We have been self-convicted of falsehood in prayer; for, though praying in the full dress of sound words, we did not desire that our supplications should be heard at the expense of that one idol.

Perhaps that single sin has woven itself like a web over large spaces of our life. It may have run like a shuttle to and fro in the texture of some plan of life, on which our conscience has not glared fiercely as upon a crime, because the usage of the world has blindfolded conscience by the respectability of such sin. Yet it has been all the while tightening its folds around us, repressing our liberty in prayer, stopping the life-blood and stiffening the fibre of our moral being, till we are like kneeling corpses in our worship.

That is a deceptive notion which attributes the want of unction in prayer to an arbitrary, or even inexplicable, withdrawment of God from the soul. Aside from the operation of physical causes, where is the warrant, in reason or revelation, for ascribing joylessness in prayer to any other cause than some wrong in the soul itself? What says an old prophet? "Behold, the Lord's ear is not heavy that it cannot hear. But your iniquities have separated between you and your God. Your sins have hid his face from you. Therefore, we wait for light, but behold obscurity; for brightness, but we walk in darkness. We grope for the wall like the blind; we grope, as if we had no eyes; we stumble at noonday as in the night; we are in desolate places, as dead men." Could words describe more truthfully, or explain more philosophically, that phenomenon of religious experience which we call the "hiding of God's countenance"?

It does not require what the world pronounces a great sin, to break up the serenity of the soul in its devotional hours. The experience of prayer has delicate complications. A little thing, secreted there, may dislocate its mechanism and arrest its movement. The spirit of prayer is to the soul what the eye is to the body,—the eye, so limpid in its nature, of such fine finish and such intricate convolution in its structure, and of so sensitive nerve, that the point of a needle may excruciate it, and make it weep itself away.

Even a doubtful principle of life, harbored in the heart, is perilous to the peacefulness of devotion. May not many of us find the cause of our joylessness in prayer, in the fact that we are living upon some unsettled principles of conduct? We are assuming the rectitude of courses of life, with which we are not ourselves honestly satisfied. I apprehend that there is very much of suspense of conscience among Christians upon subjects of practical life, on which there is no suspense of action. Is there not a pretty large cloud-land covered by the usages of Christian society? And may not some of us find there the sin which infects our devotions with nauseous incense?

Possibly our hearts are shockingly deceitful in such iniquity. Are we strangers to an experience like this—that when we mourn over our cold prayers as a misfortune, we evade a search of that disputed territory for the cause of them, through fear that we shall find it there, and we struggle to satisfy ourselves with an increase of spiritual duties which shall cost us no sacrifice? Are we never sensible of resisting the hints which the Holy Spirit gives us in parables, by refusing to look that way for the secret of our deadness—saying, "Not that! Oh no, not that! But let us pray more"?

Many a doubtful principle in a Christian mind, if once set in the focus of a conscience illumined by the Holy Spirit, would resolve itself into a sin, for which that Christian would turn and look up guiltily to the Master, and then go out and weep bitterly.

Conversation with a College President.

Dear Bro. Wendell:—I wish to present to the readers of the Crisis a conversation that took place sometime since between President Edwin B. Fairfield, of Hillsdale College, and myself, in the presence of Samuel Orr and his wife. I reside some eight miles from Hillsdale. President Fairfield came into our section of country to deliver lectures on Anatomy and Physiology. I heard him a number of times, and received the impression that he did not agree in sentiment fully with the popular Orthodoxy of the day, never mentioning even once the idea of man's possessing an immortal soul, or spirit, in connection with his lectures. He never told his audiences where such a spiritual nature was located.

On the afternoon previous to his lecture in our school-house, he called on S. Orr, our nearest neighbor. I went over there soon after he called, and in a short time something was dropped religiously, upon which the President remarked, "now I want to know what you believe. I have heard a good deal about you." I remarked that there was one thing we did not believe, and that was the doctrine of endless hell torments. Response, "nor I either, and have not believed it for years." "What do you believe will be become of the wicked." "I believe they will be annihilated." "What," said I, "annihilated?" "Yes," said he, "annihilated." "Well," said I, "we do not make use of the term annihilation, but use such language as this: 'death,' 'destroy,' 'destruction,' 'perish,' 'consume,' 'devour,' 'burnt up root and branch,' 'be as though they had not been,'" etc. "Well," said he, "that is just what I mean by it," stating at the same time that there were many, or a number, who stood connected with the various denominations, who had abandoned the theory of endless misery. The frankness with which he made the above acknowledgements, only increased my confidence in the man, and led me to make further inquiries. Consequently, I asked him when he believed the church would receive her reward. The answer was definite and prompt—"At the coming of Christ and the resurrection." I remarked that this was in harmony with our faith, i. e., no reward this side of the resurrection. I asked him if he believed the Scriptures to be a sufficient rule of faith and practice. He replied that he did, and did not care one cent what become of creeds. It was enough for him to know what the Bible taught. At the supper table I asked him where he thought the saints' inheritance would be located. He answered that he was not satisfied as to that point. Then I presented, in a concise manner, our faith touching the kingdom of God; that its locality would be on the earth,—under the whole heavens, after the earth's renovation. He answered, "probably that is so. I have no objection to that view." Now let it be understood that President Fairfield assumed the spiritual nature of man and the consciousness of the dead during this conversation, notwithstanding his acknowledgments; upon what ground, the devoted and enlightened student of God's word must judge.

Subsequent to this conversation, in the store of L. S. Parmely & Son, I asked President Fairfield when individuals become heirs of eternal life. The question was evaded at first, but finally answered, that when individuals were truly converted to God, they then were made heirs. Truth. All men, then, till conversion, are not heirs; by conversion we are adopted into God's family; consequently then are heirs, and this heir-ship runs out when the church or children come into the possession of eternal life, which is at the second coming of Christ and the resurrection. Truth, truth, God's truth, as true as you live.

Answer to an Inquiry.

A brother inquires through the Crisis for Prof. Bush's translation of Dan. 12 : 2. In his work on the Resurrection the Prof. gives an extended, able, and exhaustive analysis of the text in question. After demonstrating the impropriety of our present translation, he says:

"As the result of the whole, then, we give the following as the correct explication of the passage, which will at once afford an answer to the objection, that the same thing—viz., awaking—is predicated of both classes: 'And many of the sleepers of the dust shall awake; these (the awakened) (shall be) to everlasting life; and those (the unawakened) (shall be) to shame and everlasting contempt.'"

Whatever may be our opinion of Prof. Bush's doctrinal teachings, no unprejudiced person will question his christian character, or his capability as an interpreter of the original text of Scripture, and especially of the Hebrew text. J. T. C.

Oct. 24, 1861.

Bro. W. Shepherd furnishes us information similar to the above, and adds:—"I will give you Aben Ben Ezra, a celebrated Jewish Rabbi's rendering of this passage: 'Those who shall awake shall be appointed to everlasting life, but those who awake not shall be (doomed) to shame and everlasting contempt.' The famous and learned Gaon says—'that this is the resuscitation of the dead in Israel whose lot is to eternal life, and those who shall not awake are the forsaken of Jehovah. They are the destroyed of the Lord—who go down to the habitation beneath, i. e., gehenna, and shall be an abomination to all flesh.'"

Back Numbers.

Bro. Wendell:—The offer I made a few weeks since respecting the Crisis, has been responded to by a Sister in New York State, who wishes to distribute them among her friends that are opposed to the Second Advent faith. This is just where they ought to go. Opposition to the Advent faith and many other things often arise from a want of the knowledge and truth in relation to them. Have any other brethren the numbers containing the communications of "The Coming Struggle," by Bro. Lombard? If so, and they wish to dispose of them, send them to the Crisis Office, directed to me. Let us keep our Armor.

"Wherefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall."—1 Cor. 10: 12.

I had submitted myself and all my ways to God, taking the Holy Spirit as my teacher, guide, reprover and comforter, and felt safe and happy while walking in the path which I was confident would lead me to perfect love, and the assurance of acceptance through Christ. But, in an unexpected moment, the enemy approached a place not so well fortified. I resisted and he retreated; and, as I turned away and sat musing on the victory gained, a soft whisper said, "there is still danger." But I mused on, still thinking that my armor was secure, when I was suddenly aroused from the fatal reverie by a well known voice,—"The enemy is here!" I turned to grasp my sword, but it was gone, together with my shield. The enemy had approached at this unguarded moment and borne them away in triumph, while I only caught a glimpse of them when too late for recovery. Experience alone can know the sorrow, the distress, the bitter anguish and repentings of my soul as I laid my mantle in the dust and cried, "O why was I so careless and stupid? Why did I not look better to my armor, and why did I not heed the soft whisperings of the Spirit teacher? But now, too late, I see it all." I mourned and wept, for prayer was out of the question. I tried to plead, but how I looked! so hateful, so filthy and vile, that for days I loathed myself as I walked about, wishing that I could hide myself from the sight of mortals. Sometimes it seemed that I had committed the unpardonable sin; then again a faint ray of hope would light up the gloom that surrounded me.

At length I had occasion to write to an absent brother, but what could I write for comfort when I felt none myself? But, in closing, I quoted Titus 2: 11-14. They had no particular interest, except a clause of the 14th verse, "that he might redeem us from all iniquity." And, as I thought on the time of redemption, these words, as if spoken by an angel and expressly for me, were applied with such power, influence and glory as is beyond language to describe,—"Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." And at the same moment one approached me, so gentle, mild and lovely, smiling with such pity and forgiveness, presenting my sword and shield again, that words can never express with what emotions of joy and gladness I grasped and fastened my recovered armor anew to my side. I left my work and retired to give vent to the overflowing tide of love that now filled my soul, in thanksgiving and praise to God. Tongue nor pen can never describe the blessedness and glory of that love. O the height and depth of that love which the Father bestows through Christ! May its divine power increase daily in my soul while life remains. I am his, for he has bought me with a price, and through him I expect to overcome, and with the redeemed join in the song, "Worthy is the Lamb!" in the kingdom that never shall end. EXPERIENCE.

Persecutions.

Art thou weary, pilgrim? Do the cares of this life, the buffetings of the world, and bitter persecutions make thee sad? Dost thou look back upon the sore temptations, strifes and turmoils through which thou hast already come, and feel like giving up the battle? Dost thou feel that thou wilt still be called to pass through deep waters? Then turn thine eye to brighter scenes. Remember that "our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Lift up thy head and take courage. "All that will live godly in Christ shall suffer persecution." "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." But O, cheering thought! "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven; for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you." What comfort! what consolation! How it cheers the weary, wayworn pilgrim, to call to mind the precious promises of Jesus! It gives him courage; it lifts up his sinking head, and invigorates him afresh to prosecute the christian race.

Persecutions will come; but why murmur? Art thou better than thy Master? Did not thy Saviour encounter the buffetings of a wicked world? Hast thou suffered like the Apostles? No, no. Then cease thy murmuring, dry up thy tears, and press forward. Soon thy trials may end. The Saviour is expected soon to appear; and when he comes he will set thee free. Then murmur not, then weep not, but bear trouble with christian fortitude. "Walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Do this, and when Jesus comes all will be well. [illegible] ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." Glorious privilege! How we exalt at the thought that we shall then be forever with the Saviour! Then sorrow, crying, pain and death will be unknown, for God's own hand will wipe away all tears. May both reader and writer "do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." Amen. G. W. GREEN.

Idle Conversation.

This is a subject of vast importance to all that are living in these last days; especially to all those that are trying to follow in the footsteps of the meek and lowly Jesus. Evils of every description imaginable are everywhere to be seen throughout the land; and among the most prominent of these, perhaps, is idle conversation. We see it in all conditions of the human family—from those that live in the lowest depths of degradation and poverty, to those that revel in the highest rank of riches and honor. We see it not only in the worldling, but also in the professor of religion. Even those who are trying to exalt the standard of piety by keeping the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, are more or less affected with its degrading influence. It has entered the hearts of the children of men by intuition from the Evil one, and like the viper, saps away the life of pure and undefiled religion. By its influence men have almost entirely lost confidence in one another; so that it has become a common thing for them to break their word, and pass it idly by, as though it were of no value.

When we behold the sad effects of this evil upon the inhabitants of the earth, and see the instrument that Satan is using to draw them down to ruin, is it not high time to inquire into this important question? Let us look at it in the light of our Savior's language upon this subject. Matt. 12: 36, 37. "But I say unto you that every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment. For by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." What language can be more to the point than this? Can we pass it by unheeded, and join ourselves with the world, and then say we are safe? The apostle James says (chap. 4: 4, "Know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God." O, how dreadful to be the enemy of God! "Vengeance belongeth unto me, I will recompense, saith the Lord. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." Heb. 10: 30, 31.

Foolish talking and jesting is so universal at the present day, that it requires every effort on the part of the christian to avoid its influence. Says Paul, "Let neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, be once named among you as becometh saints; for they are not convenient." Eph. 5: 3, 4. But on the contrary, "our conversation should be in heaven, from whence also we look for our Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ." Phil. 3: 20. It should be holy, "but as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation." 1 Pet. 1: 15. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." James 3: 2. "For he that will love life and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile." 1 Pet. 3: 10.

May God help us to heed the counsel of his word on every point, that we may be without spot when Jesus comes.—The Review and Herald

Conference at Wayne.

The Conference at Wayne, Me., commenced, according to appointment, on Thursday, Oct. 17th, continuing over Sunday. There was a fair attendance of brethren and the community during the first three days, though rainy, and on Sunday all that could be convened. The interest felt in our devotions and our hope by the community, was really encouraging to all who felt an interest in their salvation. Their interest and care for our wants, and uncommon liberality in bearing the burden of supporting the meeting, have endeared the community to all the brethren present.

The meeting was commenced in the Spirit, and carried through with increasing interest, the bond of peace characterising our devotions throughout. It was marked by a deeper feeling of devotion and spirituality, than any other that I have attended for several years. Brethren were strengthened, cheered, encouraged and united, through the blessing of God, on the occasion, and the community were deeply impressed with a consideration of their eternal interests. The preaching brethren present were Brn. Fassett, Haggett, Hanscome, Searey, Abbott, Wight, Dudley and Lombard.

We devoted Thursday afternoon, the first meeting, to prayer and conference, and in the evening Bro. Fassett preached, from Isa. 61: 1-3, an entertaining discourse, enlisting the interest of the hearers. Friday forenoon was devoted to a prayer meeting; [illegible]. In the afternoon Bro. Wight preached from Isa. 25: 14,—"The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will shew them his covenant;" shewing that God's care for his children would not suffer him to withhold his concerns from them, inasmuch as they were his "friends," and that we have a special interest in the Abrahamic covenant. In the evening Bro. Hanscome preached from 1 John 3: 2, 3, a spirited discourse, encouraging to believers, and impressive to all.

Saturday morning we had a prayer meeting from 9 o'clock till 11, when a practical discourse was preached by the writer from Matt. 6: 19. In the afternoon Bro. Fassett preached from Acts 24: 14, 15, showing the "heresy" of a literal resurrection in the minds of professed orthodoxy, but its sure foundation in the word of God. In the evening Bro. Seavey preached from Isa. 2: 1, 2, 3, throwing in a guard against the "peace and safety" doctrine.

Sunday morning we met at 8 1-2 o'clock for a love feast, continuing till 10, while thirty cheering testimonies were given, when we attended to the Lord's supper. Then Bro. Fassett preached from Matt. 10: 7, showing the church are still awaiting the coming of the kingdom of God, to be set up when Jesus comes. In the afternoon Bro. Hanscome preached from 2 Tim. 4: 8, making prominent the time of reward, as the resurrection at the coming of Jesus. Sunday evening Bro. Fassett spoke on the condition of the nations, from Isa. 28: 21, 22. It was a stirring discourse, and left a deep impression resting on the minds of the congregation. We parted reluctantly, after such refreshing seasons of encouragement and cheer, but with an increased determination to hold out to the end, when we may enjoy a more happy meeting, to part no more. Correspondence.

From Sr. Lydia M. Collins.

DEAR BRO. WENDELL:—I want to say a few words through the Crisis to the brethren and sister scattered abroad, especially Bro. and Sr. Eastman. Myself and daughter have both been very sick with a fever. But through the prayers of the faithful, God has blessed the means used for our recovery, and we are again permitted to resume our work in a measure. Sickness, however, has not left our dwelling. My husband, who has so long watched over us, has at last become a victim and is prostrated. My son also is sick, and I have no one in this hour of trial to look to but God.

Last night, while taking care of my sick companion, I felt so deeply weighed down with grief while revolving in my own mind the responsibilities that rested upon me, a poor, feeble woman, that I longed to go away by myself, where none but God would hear, and there humble my soul in the dust before him. And to-day, when I took up my paper to write, I felt the impression that I must first look into my Crisis, which I did. The first thing that my eye rested upon gave me relief. It was the blessed words of the Saviour, "It is I, be not afraid." I read the article through, and found it to be just what I wanted in this hour of my affliction. I bless God for it; write again, Bro. Dennett. Perhaps you may cheer up some other desponding heart.

Brothers and sisters, pray for us; pray for my dear companion, that he may be speedily restored to health; and, the grace of God assisting us, we will try and meet you in the kingdom. Your sister in affliction.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Jo Davis Co., Ill., Sept. 16th, 1861, Brother SAMUEL BLAKE, in the fifty-first year of his age, after a sickness of five months fell asleep to rest until Jesus comes.

Brother Blake was a member of the Baptist Church for many years, and enjoyed many precious seasons while there. When he heard the glorious news of the return of Christ to the earth, he gladly embraced the doctrine, and since that time it has been a source of comfort to him to converse on the truths of the Bible. "The Bible hope was his hope." He expected to sleep but a short time until the trump would sound, then he expected to awake in the likeness of Christ and be satisfied. During his illness he said he would like to see Bro. W. Pratt, and hear him speak of that glory that is to be revealed at the coming of Christ. A few days before his death he expressed a desire for the change to take place when he would rest in his grave. He said he desired rest. His sufferings at times were very great, yet it was a consolation to his friends to know his faith was unshaken in the promises of God. Our Brother leaves a companion, eight children, and a large number of friends to mourn their loss; but we sorrow not as those who have no hope. His companion and some of his children were with him in the blessed hope. He exhorted his family and friends (those he could not see he sent word to them) to prepare to meet him in the kingdom.

Sermon by Eld. L. A. Pilcher, a Baptist minister, who endeavored to impart a word of consolation to the bereft from Job 19: 26, and spoke freely concerning the resurrection of the saints and life at the coming of Christ. May the blessing of God ever be with the widow and fatherless. A. B. P.

Fell asleep in Jesus, Oct. 9th, 1861, my beloved parent, NATHANIEL CUNNINGHAM, in the sixty-third year of his age. [illegible] From May 9th, after a lingering and painful sickness of many months, which was borne with christian patience and a sweet resignation to the will of God, he calmly fell asleep in Jesus, to await that blest morn when the dead in Christ shall be raised incorruptible, and this mortal shall put on immortality, and with good old Job he would wait all his appointed time till his change come. He rejoiced that his Redeemer lived, and would stand at the last day upon the earth; that in his flesh he should see God. He leaves a wife and eleven children, six sons and five daughters, who deeply feel their loss; but we mourn not as others that have no hope, for we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

Our dear father will be much missed in the Christian Church, of which he has been a leading member for many years. In 1857 he embraced the blessed truth of immortality and eternal life through Christ alone, and the soon coming of the Lord Jesus, his righteous Judge, to reign with his immortalized saints on the new made earth. His funeral was attended by a large circle of friends and acquaintances, who deeply sympathize with us in our affliction. An appropriate discourse was delivered on the occasion, from Num. 23: 10,—"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." May God sanctify this affliction to our good, and bring us eventually, an unbroken family, into the kingdom of his dear Son.

We have followed him to the silent tomb,
And gently laid him down,
But soon he'll rise in immortal bloom,
With glory robed and crowned.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

The Pacific Telegraph.

The public woke up on Saturday morning to learn that the Pacific Telegraph had been completed—and we suspect that no small portion of the same public then learned for the first time that there was to be any Pacific Telegraph. This certainly was a very different phenomenon from the universal sound and fury which greeted the laying of the Atlantic Telegraph, and we are confident that the result will be very different. While the country has been plunged into a mighty struggle, involving its national integrity, and armies have been mustering on every hand, a few men have gone out to the westward with coils of wire, until they met a similar band coming from the Pacific coast—and thus time has been virtually struck out as an element in the communion between the loyal people by the two oceans. Here is the simplicity of a grand, beneficent and permanent achievement.

A band has been laid across the continent of North America—covering nearly 5000 miles—on which space and time are practically reduced to the mechanical task of writing on and writing off the messages. The sun in the heavens becomes a laggard in his movements. The news which starts from Cape Race at four o'clock in the afternoon will reach San Francisco about half an hour before noon of the same day. And yet in a few days, this marvel will cease to excite a thought. For a little time the daily California dispatches will seem slightly odd, and then the public will receive them—perhaps grumble about them—like other newspaper matter. And so it will be in a year or two, when Russia, pushing her lines to the eastward, shall join with ours at Behring's Straits, and link two worlds together.—Boston Journal.

CAN IT BE? The Washington correspondent of the New York Post says:

"I learn, upon good authority, that General McClellan asserts that the Leesburg reconnoissance was made without consultation with him, and that General Scott ordered it, or Stone executed it without orders. General McClellan's friends assert further that he will resign if such movements are to to be made without his authority, while he is at least nominally commander. It is said that Gen. Scott, without the assent of McClellan, ordered Gen. Stone to cross the river for a simple reconnoissance."

☞ Our correspondent, "Shawmut," in a letter from Poolesville, Md., says:

"No matter what anybody says to the contrary, it is true that people in Virginia are suffering severely from the want of the necessaries of life, as salt and coffee and the like. They are also cutting up their carpets to make blankets for the soldiers, and things are in a sad state with them. I have this from refugees just escaped, with, who are perfectly reliable."

New York, Oct. 28. The Tribune's Washington dispatch says that an order has been sent with the officers commanding the naval expedition to govern themselves, so far as persons held to service are concerned, by the principles of the letters addressed to Gen. Butler; but discretionary power is given to the commander for special circumstances, and instructions are given to avail themselves of the services of any persons, whether fugitives from labor or not, who may offer themselves, to be employed in such a manner as is deemed most beneficial to the service, also to assure all loyal masters that Congress will provide a just compensation to them for the loss of the services of persons so employed.

Washington, Oct. 28. The following has been received by the American Consul at Antwerp:

Caprera, Sept. 10. My Dear Sir—I saw Mr. Sandford, and regret to be obliged to announce that I shall not be able to go to the United States at present.

I do not doubt of the triumph of the cause of the Union, and that shortly, but if war should unfortunately continue in your beautiful country I shall overcome all obstacles which detain me, to hasten to the defence of a people who are so dear to me. Yours, G. GARIBALDI.

To M. Quigley, U. S. Consul, Antwerp.

CAMP RICHARDSON, Bolivar, Polk county, Mo., Oct. 26. A special dispatch to the St. Louis Democrat says Gen. Fremont and staff arrived at Bolivar, [illegible] from Camp Morrison, and encamped this evening on the outskirts of the town. Bolivar, like nearly all the towns in the southwest, is almost entirely deserted, the stores being closed, and many of the houses abandoned. It is now ascertained that the loss of the Fremont Body Guard in the brilliant charge at Springfield was from 6 to 8 killed, and some 14 to 20 wounded. A number of most brilliant instances of daring were shown on our side. One Sergeant had three horses shot from under him, and a rebel placed a pistol at a Surgeon's head, and was in the very act of firing when the Major severed his arm from the shoulder and laid him dead at his horse's feet.

Col. Carr's 3d Illinois cavalry and Major Holman's sharpshooters have left here for Springfield, and one regiment of Gen. Sigel's division will march there at midnight. Gen. Fremont and staff and Gen. Sigel's division start by forced marches for Springfield at daylight to-morrow morning, and will probably arrive there in the evening.

Gen. McKinstry was two miles north of Warsaw last night. Gen. Pope was this side of the Osage, and Gen. Hunter in advance of him, all marching to this point.

I understand that in the forthcoming battle Generals Sturgis and Lane will have the left wing, Gen. Hunter the right, Asboth the main column, and McKinstry's division will form the reserve, Gen. Sigel taking the advance.

Special dispatches to the St. Louis Democrat say that General Kennedy, who has just returned to Sedalia from Price's army, states that Price's men are much dissatisfied at the prospect of leaving the State, and that they will force him to make a stand within our borders.

Considerable numbers of Gen. Price's rebels are arriving in this section daily, and it is feared that they will renew their plundering habits as soon as our troops leave.

For the Crisis.

The Heavenly Conqueror.

"And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written, that no man knew, but he himself. And he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood: and his name is called The Word of God. And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean. And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords."—Rev. 19: 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16.

Ride forth, thou Mighty Conqueror,
With vestments dipped in blood;
In righteousness thou dost make war—
Thy name The Word of God.

Thy many, many crowns proclaim,
Thy many victories won;
Faithful and True thou art called by name—
King of kings and God's own Son.

The kings of earth array themselves
To fight against the Lord,
But thou wilt gain the victory
And break them with thy rod.

Thine armies, clothed in purity,
Will follow at thy word;
Thy enemies before thee fall,
Slain by thy piercing sword.

Thou hast a faithful little band
Thy coming to gladly hail,
Looking for that "day at hand,"
When heaven and earth shall fail.

Lord, very great is the reward
Thou givest the faithful few—
Eternal life thou hast promised those
That thy commandments do.

May I, O Lord, that life obtain,
And ever dwell with thee;
My hope is through the Saviour slain,
And mercy full and free.

For the Crisis.

Natural—Spiritual.

There is a natural man—or body, there is a spiritual man—or body, and so it is written, "The first man Adam was made a living soul"—or person; Gen. 2: 7. "The last Adam," or representative of another order of the race of Adam, "was made a quickening spirit." Here then we have before us a declaration, and it declares thus:—what the first Adam was, the second Adam is not. The first man was, and all who are descended of him are of the earth, earthy; and the facts in the case fully prove this;—from the cradle to the grave, man is a poor creature.

The scriptures of the New Testament have much in them which speaks of natural and spiritual men and things, and they as fully amplify on these as is necessary to make them plain, when relatively considered; but man, ever prone to find out witty or cunning inventions, has reared a system so diametrically opposed to the simplicity of these things, that to-day we find "confusion worse confounded." In order properly to know so as to comprehend what the mind of the Spirit is, we have to compare (as the Apostle Paul has recommended) spiritual things, or the things of the Spirit, with the things of the Spirit; by these means, and these only, can we acquire the knowledge of God as He has made himself known. We may think this, that, or the other is the true sense in which certain scriptures are to be understood,—we may quote certain scriptures to prove what we think is the sense; as, for instance, those who talk largely about the immortality of the soul—they have been educated into the belief that man, i. e. the casket, has inside of him a jewel that worlds cannot buy; and they at the same time use that scripture, "and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul," to prove that then and there this immortal and immaterial essence was imparted, while we know that the very reverse is true, for, taking the Apostle's advice, we find that "the Lord God formed MAN of the dust of the ground," and then by the inspiration of a motive power styled "the breath of life," "MAN became a living soul." The conclusion is evident that he was man before he lived, and after he lived he was nothing more than a living man, or soulical being. Now if God takes away this breath, (and that he does is true,) man turns to the earth as he was, and so he must forever remain unless something else is done for him; and if this be the true condition of man, living or dead, what becomes of the false doctrine of the immortality of the soul, which, at best, can only be a part of the man, unless it be, as some declare, a part of God, which declaration is as foolish as blasphemous?

Man, naturally considered, is void of the understanding of God. By all the combined wisdom of six thousand years, the natural man has never been able to find out God. There has been speculation sufficient, and "philosophy, falsely so called," of too great an abundance; but to-day we are no nearer the solution of the problem, "What is the destiny of humanity?" than we were six thousand years gone by. And why? have we not been told, and is it not a saying so trite that it is in the mouth of every one almost, that this glorious nineteenth century is far, very far advanced in all knowledge, arts and sciences? Admit that all this is true, what more do we know from these progressions as to the state of man at death and beyond it? Here, human knowledge avails not; here, art shows no light; here, science fails, utterly fails. True, we have the science (?) of Spiritualism, and this certainly is not of the nineteenth century, for as far back as the time our first parents were produced, there also was this system first breathed. "Ye shall not surely die" was then said, and the same words have rung upon our ears from that day to this; so the foundation stone of Spiritualism was then laid, and to-day it shows itself worthy of its founder—the Devil. But what have they (Spiritualists) proven? O, says one, they prove to a demonstration that the soul is immortal." Ah! and pray how do they prove it? Why, they prove that when a person dies, (i. e. continues to live,) they then are able to tell us who our grandmother was, or perhaps something still greater—who was Pontius Pilate's mother; or are able to do things still greater, as tip tables, and sundry other monkey shines, which certainly does not prove a farther advance in knowledge and power, but the very reverse. So it is; we may ever grope by what is called the "light of nature," and in the end we shall be no further advanced in the knowledge of God. Says Paul, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know, (as a natural man,) because they are spiritually discerned"; that is, they—the things of God—cannot be known by mere human or natural wisdom; and this is a statement the natural man hates, for he desires to be thought profoundly wise, and thinks naturally he has ability to think out the great thoughts of God. O, vain man! when wilt thou learn to accept and appropriate that wisdom which is from above, which is in its beginning the fear of the Lord?

"The carnal mind is enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be"; and also, "To be carnally minded," and so always to remain, "is death"; for all who "sow to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption." Thus we perceive that man, naturally, is not to be accounted of, for his breath is in his nostrils, and in the hour of death he is weak as any worm.

A spiritual man, or body, then, stands opposed to the natural man or body; as Christ, after his resurrection: he then became a spirit body; having been loosed from the pains or cords of death, death had no more dominion over him; for a time it did, but "God raised Jesus from the dead, no more to return to corruption." Here, then, was an exhibition of Almighty power; a power endowing a body of the seed of David with endless life. Thus, being raised from the dead, he becomes a quickening or life-imparting Spirit, and so he forever remains.

The traditions by which the Jewish nation were surrounded, the darkness of their times as expressed by John 1: 5, was a moral darkness. Jesus was a Light, and when He shone they comprehended him not; their darkness became blindness, and it is on them this day. They could not see how the King they looked for could be a sufferer, and die; it was contrary to their expectations; they, therefore, judged themselves nationally unworthy of Him who was born "King of the Jews"; they made their darkened expectations their criterion of proof;—and so it is to-day; there is just as much, yea, it is intensified darkness, as as to what constitutes a spiritual body. On one occasion, and that a very memorable one, when Jesus journeyed to the village of Emmaus, he met with two apostles, and after expounding to them the Scriptures concerning himself, and after he had taken bread and blessed it, and had given to them, their eyes were opened, and he ceased to be seen of them. They then returned to Jerusalem and spread the news, and as they spake Jesus was in their midst, and they were terrified, and supposed they had seen a spirit (or phantom). See Mark 6: 49. But Jesus soon set at rest their minds on this, for said he, "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself: handle me and see: for a spirit (or phantom) hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." "And he showed them his hands and his feet."

Here we have illustrated the power a spirit body has of being seen, and as easily becoming unseen; not because of its intangibility, as we are told a spirit is, but a body having hands, feet, and adjuncts, but made to live and move by a power styled the Spirit of God. So the records given by the apostles tell us, "If the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up the Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by (or because of) his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Thus being made alive from the death state, and Jesus having come, he thus makes our "vile bodies like unto his glorious body" by the power by which he is able to subdue all things unto himself. This, then, is the thing hoped for; a change from mortality to immortality, from corruptibility to incorruptibility, from vile bodies to glorious and angel-like bodies;—for they that attain the world to come so as to enter into the life of that world, are to be as the angels—they die no more. Seeing such things are before us, and that it is desirable to attain such things, let us heartily renounce the sky kingdom and immortal soul dogmas, and cleave to the Word, that when Christ, who is the life of all who are in him, shall appear, we may appear with him glorified and in glory.

For the Crisis.

From Elder Henry Pratt.

Haverstraw, Sept. 17. Having been landed at this place to be taken on board the Aurora, which had already passed, and finding no one to ferry me over the river, I wound my way through the rain, brick, mortar and mud, to a Hotel, and unshouldered baggage for the night. The evening bell of a Methodist church brought in a few to their vestry room for prayer and conference. Thinking I might find some old-fashioned Methodists in this one-side or out-side place, I ventured in. The preacher soon came in, like a man of business, and called upon Mr. A. to read a hymn, sing and pray; then upon Mr. B. to make some appropriate remarks, which he did, encouraging them to look no longer on the dark side of the picture, for it tended to sink them deeper in the mire to be continually talking about the lack of devotion in the church, etc. Then another prayer was called out from Bro. C. and D., till at length there was only time for one man, which would close the meeting. I thought of Methodism in former days, and of Methodism at it is, and I felt sad. That crucifying doctrine of sanctification, or life of holiness without which no man should see the Lord, in which the Methodists gloried, had fled, and instead, I heard in their prayers, "O Lord, I am a sinner; I sin continually." Could the Devil wish for a better servant than that? So I thought I would like to hear from the sisters, to see if they were all of that stamp; but as they were not called out, and no invitation was given to them to take part in the meeting, I hoped they were not all so wicked as to "sin continually"; and so the meeting closed, after which the preacher came forward and said—"Good evening, brethren; (for Bro. Hicks was with me), I suppose I may call you brethren for being found at such a place as this." I replied, that I liked to attend social meetings where all had the privilege of talking and praying, as they used to have among the Methodists, for I was brought up among the Presbyterians where all must be mute as Quakers unless called out by the minister, and I used to find a great relief to get into a Methodist meeting where the brethren could talk when the Lord would have them, and the sisters would have their share of the worship, too.

Wednesday, 18th. Came over to Sing Sing, and thence through rain and mud to Pleasantville. Commenced meeting Thursday under Bro. Wild's beautiful banner with Christ's motto, "Thy kingdom come." We brought out the great principles of the new constitution, and defended them in the face of the enemy, the brethren backing up the word with a zeal according to knowledge. And though they had threatened the life of any man that dared to preach peace principles, they felt much more like saving their own lives from the coming storm than killing others, when we got through. An elderly Quaker opened his doors, feeding all who would come. He said he had been inquiring for twenty years of all that he supposed could give information respecting these things, but had got no light till now. He seemed in a transport of joy at such light as he said he got from these sermons. Others came, saying, "Why have not these things been seen before?" I sat during the prayer meetings in the tent to answer inquiries and explaining the chart, and I found it good to be there. The angels that encamp around His saints were an all-sufficient police, and our last meetings on the Sabbath and Sabbath evening were characterized with more solemnity than is usually manifested on funeral occasions. O that Advent brethren would learn to trust in Him whose delight it is to say, "Fear not them that can kill the body"! We pray "Thy kingdom come," and by thus praying we say, let the kingdoms of this world be dashed in pieces; and shall we try to keep them from dashing? Shall we sneak out of the position that God has called us to occupy, or manfully do his work? Shall we lend our aid in trying to sustain these governments that are tottering to their fall? or, like men who know their doom, cry mightily, "Stand from under." God help us to stand, and, "after having done all, to stand." No wonder the Maine Conference call for Advent papers to come to their "specific" work. "Tis time we all awake."

But to my pilgrimage. After leaving this consecrated spot with many inquiring the way to life, I came to Newark. Here we found the enemy at work dividing, but we trust that brethren with so much experience will better understand his wiles than to be divided in this last conflict. We had a good time with them, and trust to see them again. We met with a few of Bro. Roworth's charge at East Brooklyn, and though it was on that windy Friday night, we had a very good time in looking over the way-marks toward the kingdom.

Saturday, 25th. We were on our way to Albany up the river. Here we had a good time in reflection, till at length an aged man sat down by me and began to talk about the war. "Well," says he, "friend, what do you think will be the result of this war?" "I think it will result in the overthrow of all the kingdoms of earth, and the establishment of God's everlasting kingdom." This I found to be one of those shells that explode when they strike; so I soon had company enough. I thought first they would give me an overboard passage, but no man laid hands on me. Soon a young man stepped into the ring and said, "Did you not know that the kingdom of God was set up eighteen hundred years ago?" "No, sir, I did not." "Well, sir, you ought to have been better informed." I replied, "Perhaps I may be when you disclose to me the source of your information." "Well, sir, I have been studying upon this subject four years." "And is that all the argument you have to give us that the kingdom of heaven was set up eighteen hundred years ago?" "Why! Jesus said it was nigh at hand then." "Yes, but does that prove that it was set up there?" "But does he not say, after those days the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom?" "No, he says there shall come false Christs, nation against nation, famine, pestilence, then a long tribulation, after which the sun will be darkened, the moon withdraw her shining, the stars fall, and when you see all these things then know that it is near." "But why do you want to divert the attention from the scripture that I mentioned?" "What scripture?" "That scripture that says, after those days the God of heaven will set up his kingdom." "There is no such scripture in the Bible." "Well, then, what does it say?" "In the days of these kings the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom. And now I wish to ask you what kings or kingdoms is here meant?" "I don't choose to answer." "But you have studied four years on this subject, and now I demand of you for information what kings this has reference to in the days of which the God of heaven shall set up his kingdom?" "I don't choose to answer, but there is a minister inside—will you talk with him?" "O yes." (Exit for reinforcement.)

The Silk Worm's Will.

BY MISS H. F. GOULD.

On a plain rush hurdle a silk worm lay,
When a proud young princess came that way:
The haughty child of a human king
Threw a sidelong glance at the humble thing,
That took, with a silent gratitude,
From the mulberry leaf her simple food,
And shrunk, half scorn and half disgust,
Away from her sister child of dust—
Declaring she never yet could see
Why a reptile form like this should be,
And that she was not made with nerves so firm
As calmly to stand by a "crawling worm!"

With mute forbearance the silk worm took
The taunting words and the spurning look!
Alike a stranger to self and pride,
She'd no disquiet from aught beside—
And lived of a meekness and peace possessed,
Which these debar from the human breast.
She only wished for the harsh abuse
To find some way to become of use
To the haughty daughter of lordly man;
And thus did she lay a noble plan
To teach her wisdom and make it plain
That the humble worm was not made in vain—
A plan so generous, deep and high,
That to carry it out she must even die!

"No more," said she, "will I drink or eat!
I'll spin and weave me a winding sheet,
To wrap me up from the sun's clear light,
And hide my form from her wounded sight;
In secret, then, till my end draws nigh,
I'll toil for her; and when I die,
I'll leave behind, as a farewell boon
To the proud young princess, my whole cocoon,
To be reeled and wove to a shining lace,
And hung in a veil o'er her scornful face!
And when she can calmly draw her breath
Through the very threads that have caused my death;
When she finds, at length, she has nerves so firm
As to wear the shroud of a crawling worm,
May she bear in mind that she walks with pride
In the winding-sheet where the silk worm died!"

We shall not regret having done so, if it shall, by the force of contrast, cause our readers to exhibit more zeal in calling men's attention to the tangible doctrine of the Resurrection of the dead, through Jesus the Life-Giver, and to the substantial nature of the inheritance which God, in his Word, has promised to his children.—Editor of Crisis.]

The Spirit World.

Knickerbocker.

It is related by an elegant writer, that there is a tradition among a certain tribe of our Indians, that one of their number once descended in a vision to the great repository of souls, as we call it, the other world; and that upon his return, he gave his friends a distinct account of every thing he saw among those regions of the dead. He stated, that, after having traveled for a long space under a hollow mountain, he arrived at length on the confines of the world of spirits, but could not enter it by reason of a thick forest, made up of bushes, brambles, and pointed thorns, so perplexed and interwoven with one another, that it was impossible to find a passage through it.

While he was looking about for some track or pathway, that might be worn in any part of it, he saw a huge lion couched under the side of it, which kept his eye upon him in the same posture, as when he watches for his prey. The Indian immediately started back, while the lion rose with a spring, and leaped toward him. Being wholly destitute of weapons, he stooped down to take up a large stone in his hand; but, to his infinite surprise, grasped nothing, and found the supposed stone to be only the apparition of one.

If he was disappointed on this side, he was much pleased on the other, when he found the lion, which had seized his left shoulder, had no power to hurt him, and was only the ghost of that ravenous creature which it appeared to be. He no sooner got rid of his impotent enemy, than he marched up to the wood, and having surveyed it for some time, endeavored to press into one part of it, that was a little thinner than the rest; when again, to his great surprise, he found the bushes made no resistance, but that he walked through briers and brambles with the same ease, as through the open air; and, in short, that the whole wood was nothing else but a wood of shades. He immediately concluded that this huge thicket of thorns and brakes, was designed as a kind of fence, or quickset hedge to the ghosts it inclosed; and that probably their soft substances might be torn by these subtile points and prickles, which were too weak to make any impression in flesh and blood.

With this thought, he resolved to travel through this intricate wood; when, by degrees, he felt a gale of perfumes breathing upon him, that grew stronger and sweeter in proportion as he advanced. He had not proceeded much farther, when he observed the thorns and briers to end, and give place to a thousand beautiful green trees, covered with blossoms of the finest scents and colors, that formed a wilderness of sweets, and were a kind of lining to those ragged scenes through which he had before passed.

He had no sooner got out of the wood but he was entertained with such a landscape of flowery plains, green meadows, running streams, sunny hills, and shady vales, as were not to be represented by his own expressions, nor, as he said, by the conceptions of others. This happy region was peopled with innumerable swarms of spirits, who applied themselves to exercises and diversions, according as their fancies led them. Some of them were pitching the figure of a quoit; others were tossing the shadow of a ball; others were breaking the apparition of a horse; and multitudes, employing themselves upon ingenious handicrafts with the souls of departed utensils.

As he traveled through this delightful scene, he was very often tempted to pluck the flowers that rose every where about him, in the greatest variety and profusion, having never seen several of them in his own country; but he quickly found that, though they were objects of sight, they were not liable to his touch. He at length came to the side of a great river, and, being a good fisherman himself, stood upon the banks of it some time, to look upon an angler that had a great many shapes of fishes, which lay floundering up and down by him.

The tradition goes on to say, that the Indian had not long stood by the fisherman, when he saw, on the opposite side of the river, the shadow of his beloved wife, who had gone before him into the other world. Her arms were stretched out toward him; floods of tears ran down her eyes; her looks, her hands, her voice, called him over to her; and, at the same time, seemed to tell him that the river was impassable. Who can describe the passion, made up of joy, sorrow, love, desire, astonishment, that rose in the Indian upon the sight of his dear departed? He could express it by nothing but his tears, which ran like a river down his cheeks as he looked upon her. He had not stood in this posture long, when he plunged into the stream which lay before him; finding it to be nothing but the phantom of a river, stalked on the bottom of it till he arose on the other side.

At his approach, the loved spirit flew into his arms, while he himself longed to be disencumbered of that body which kept him from the continued enjoyment of her society. After many questions and endearments, she conducted him to a bower, which day by day she had embellished with her own hands from these blooming regions, expressly for his reception. As he stood astonished at the unspeakable beauty of the habitation, she brought two of her children to him, who had died some years before, and who resided with her in the same delightful dwelling,—imploring him to train up those others which were still with him, in such a manner, that they might hereafter all of them meet together in that happy place.

Bereaved mourner! treasure this record in thy heart of hearts. To the untutored mind, even of this poor Indian, was vouchsafed, in a vision of the night, a glimpse of that spirit-land, to which we are all tending. There we shall meet the loved and lost;—

"The dear departed, gone before
To that unknown and silent shore,
Sure we shall meet as here of ore,
Some summer morning."

Romance in Prayer.

"If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me."—Ps. 66: 18.

We often affront God by offering prayers which we are not willing to have answered. Theoretical piety is never more deceptive than in acts of devotion. We pray for blessings which we know to be accordant with God's will, and we persuade ourselves that we desire those blessings. In the abstract, we do desire them. A sane mind must be far gone in sympathy with devils, if it can help desiring all virtue in the abstract.

The dialect of prayer established in Christian usage, wins our trust; we sympathize with its theoretical significance; we find no fault with its intensity of spiritual life. It commends itself to our conscience and good sense, as being what the phraseology of devout affection should be. Ancient forms of prayer are beautiful exceedingly. Their hallowed associations fascinate us like old songs. In certain imaginative moods, we fall into delicious reverie over them. Yet down deep in our heart of hearts, we may detect more of poetry than of piety in this fashion of joy. We are troubled, therefore, and our countenance is changed.

Many of the prime objects of prayer enchant us only in the distance. Brought near to us, and in concrete forms, and made to grow life-like in our conceptions, they very sensibly abate the pulse of our longing to possess them, because we cannot but discover that, to realize them in our lives, certain other darling objects must be sacrificed, which we are not yet willing to part with. The paradox is true to the life, that a man may even fear an answer to his prayers.

A very good devotee may be a very dishonest suppliant. When he leaves the height of meditative abstraction, and, as we very significantly say in our Saxon phrase, comes to himself, he may find that his true character, his real self, is that of no petitioner at all. His devotions have been dramatic. The sublimities of the closet have been but illusions. He has been acting a pantomime. He has not really desired that God would give heed to him, for any other purpose than to give him an hour of pleasurable devotional excitement. That his objects of prayer should actually be inwrought into his character, and should live in his own consciousness, is by no means the thing he has been thinking of, and is the last thing he is ready just now to wish for. If he has a christian heart buried up anywhere beneath this heap of pietism, it is very probable that the discovery of the burlesque of prayer of which he has been guilty, will transform his fit of romance into some sort of hypochondriacal suffering. Despondency is the natural offspring of theatrical devotion.

Let us observe this paradox of christian life in two or three illustrations.

An envious christian—we must tolerate the contradiction: to be true to the facts of life, we must join strange opposites—an envious christian prays, with becoming devoutness, that God will impart to him a generous, loving spirit, and a conscience void of offence to all men. His mind is in a solemn state, his heart is not insensible to the beauty of the virtues which he seeks. His posture is lowly, his tones sincere, and self-delusion is one of those processes of weakness which are facilitated by the deception of bodily habitude. His prayer goes on glibly, till conscience grows impatient, and reminds him of certain of his equals, whose prosperity stirs up within him that "envy which is the rottenness of the bones."

What then? Very probably, he quits that subject of prayer, and passes to another, on which his conscience is not so eagle-eyed. But after that glimpse of a hidden sin, how do the clouds of estrangement from God seem to shut him in, dark and damp and chill, and his prayer become like a dismal pattering of rain!

An ambitious christian prays that God will bestow upon him a humble spirit. He volunteers to take a low place, because of his unworthiness. He asks that he may be delivered from pride and self-seeking. He repeats the prayer of the publican, and the benediction upon the poor in spirit. The whole group of the virtues kindred to humility, seems to him as radiant as the Graces with loveliness. He is sensible of no check in the fluency of his emotions, till his conscience, too, becomes angry, and dashes the little eddy of goodness which is just now covering up the undertow of selfishness that imperils his soul. If then he is not melted into tears at the disclosure of his heartlessness, that prayer probably ends in a clouded brow, and a feverish, querulous self-conflict.

A revengeful christian prays that he may have a meek spirit; that he may be harmless as doves; that the synonymous graces of forbearance, long-suffering, patience, may adorn his life; that he may put away bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamor, and evil-speaking, with all malice; that that mind may be found in him which was also in Christ. At the moment of this devotional episode in his experience, he feels, as Rousseau did, the abstract grandeur of a magnanimity like that of Jesus. There is no doubt about the fervor of his theoretic love of such an ideal of character; and he is about to take courage from his rapture, when his conscience becomes impertinent, and mocks him, by thrusting upon his lips the words which are death to his conceit—"Forgive me as I forgive." If then he is not shocked into self-abhorrence at the ghastliness of his guilt, he probably exhausts that hour of prayer in palliations and compromises, or in reckless impositions upon the forbearance of God.

A luxurious christian prays, in the good set phrases of devotion, for a spirit of self-denial: that he may endure hardness as a good soldier of Christ; that he may take up the cross and follow Christ; that he may be ready to forsake all that he hath, and be Christ's disciple; that he may not live unto himself; that he may imitate Him who went about doing good,—who became poor that we might be rich, and who wept over lost souls. In such a prayer there may be, consciously, no insincerity, but a pleasurable sympathy, rather with the grand thoughts and the grander feeling which the language portrays. The heart is buoyant with its gaseous distension to the bounds of its great swelling words.

This lover of the pride of life does not discover his self-inflation, till conscience pricks him with such goads as these: "Are you living for the things you are praying for?"—"What one thing are you doing for Christ which costs you self-denial?"—"Are you seeking for opportunities to deny yourself, to save souls?"—"Are you willing to be like Him who had not where to lay his head?"—"Can ye be baptized with the baptism that He is baptized with?" If then this effeminate one is not roused to a more Christ-like life by the uncovering of his hypocrisy, what a sickly murmuring of self-reproach fills his heart at the collapse of that prayer!

Post up the Wives.

Keep them posted, daily, promptly, cheerfully; impart to them all the light you can. Do you, husbands, post them up on all subjects of importance, interest and reform? collect facts, passing events, things interesting, profitable, edifying; things moral, intellectual and political? Sensible, intelligent, virtuous wives highly appreciate this, especially those pressed with domestic cares and duties, and have very little time for reading and investigations. Some husbands are very remiss in this benevolence; others, we are pleased to say, are happily communicative, take special pains and delight in posting their wives and children, in imparting light, life, information and salvation. At table, during meal times, and on every suitable occasion, they open their minds freely, cheerfully, edifyingly, give a condensed, succinct bird's eye view of all their book and paper readings, of all the interesting and important facts, gathered from various sources, daily, weekly, monthly. Thus wives and all present are cheered, gratified, benefitted, enabled also to impart the same information to others. This generous impartation of things profitable, interesting and edifying, produces a salutary effect on the minds and hearts of the husbands, deepening and riveting virtuous principles and important facts. "He that watereth shall be watered also himself." Husbands beloved, do you think of this? Will you think of it? This method also produces sociability and companionship between husbands and wives most pleasantly, hopefully and profitably, which would otherwise be lost.

Another important item is, it saves the trouble, labor and danger of your families wading through the mud, mire and dirt of daily and weekly politicals. Parents, are you aware of the fearful amount of danger resulting to your children from infidel papers that are filled with scenes of blood and murder, of every species of loathsome crime and lewdness? that advertise and puff romances, love ditties, theatres, circuses, horse racings, opera dancing, and every filthy and corrupting abomination that Satan could wish. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." Beware of the serpents.

The Saints' Future.

Still further would we reach, though in perspective, and strive to fix before our view, those pictures of light and glory, which, like beautiful dissolving views, rise before us, and then lose themselves in others still more exquisite; wherein is pictured the Church adorned as a bride, and, clothed with spotless righteousness, awaiting the coming of her Lord; wherein is the glorious appearing of the King of kings and Lord of lords, amid hosts of his redeemed, going forth to the final battle and victory, and to the utter destruction of AntiChrist and his adherents; and then the New Jerusalem, the abode of the blessed and risen saints, where all is union, peace and love,—no root of bitterness or discord, no cloud of sorrow; but all holy, and beautiful, and bright, and pure.

But into these scenes of transcendent glory, "surpassing fable and yet true," it is not for us to look, save "through a glass, darkly,"—not certainly with the degree of confidence which we have derived in the foregoing Lectures from tracing had the support of historical evidence. While we read the concluding chapters of the sacred volume, it is however our privilege, as believers, to anticipate and appropriate all in hope; and moreover to take comfort in the assurance that "yet a little while, and our Lord himself will come, and will not tarry." It is also our wisdom, seeing that all shall be fulfilled and speedily, to lay to heart the thought, "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness?"—or, if a time of conflict must needs first come, "Who shall be found on the Lord's side?"—E. B. Elliot.

The Christian Watchman.

Watchman, tell me, does the morning
Of fair Zion's glory dawn?—
Has the signs that mark its coming,
Yet upon my pathway shone?
Pilgrim, yes; arise! look round thee,
Light is breaking in the skies;
Gird thy bridal robe around thee,
Morning dawns! arise! arise!

Watchman, see! the light is beaming
Brighter still upon the way!
Signs through all the earth are gleaming,
Omens of the coming day,
When the Jubal Trumpet, sounding,
Shall awake, from land and sea,
All the saints of God now sleeping,
Clad in immortality.

Working with God.

"Work, for it is God that worketh in you." This beautiful union of fear, and yet holy courage, of entire dependence upon God, and yet unabated jealous "diligence to make our calling and election sure," is attainable only, nay, I may say intelligible only to a spiritual mind. Not that there is any inexplicable mystery in their connection; men are continually acting in the affairs of life in the same way. They clear their ground, sow their crops, go through all the toils of husbandry with unremitting diligence, and show they can do no more; they watch for their increase, they think of it, they talk of it with deepest interest, while yet it is undeniable that they cannot make a single blade of wheat to spring up, or bear produce. The sun must shine upon it, the rain must water it, the earth must nourish it; they can command none of these.—Bunyan.

How to Heal Family Wounds.

You have been told of a king of Spain, on whose foot a burning cinder fell out of the fire. He would have thrown it off, but it occurred to him that it was not seemly for a king to do so; he therefore called his minister. The minister said it was not his business, and gave the command to one of the pages; the page was of noble birth, and therefore called a chamberlain; but before he could come the cinder had burnt the shoe through to the foot. Dear lady, when a grief, like a red-hot cinder, falls upon your heart, do not stop, thinking whose proper duty it is to remove it, otherwise your heart may be burnt through and through. Seize it boldly, with our Lord's help, and throw it away, even though finger and thumb should be a little burnt; that hurt will soon heal.—Matrimonial Quarrels.

For the Crisis.

O for a Rest!

O for a rest, where tumults cease,
Where all earth's tempests shall be o'er,
Where the tired voyager finds his peace
Beside the fair eternal shore.

O for a rest, unchanged by time,
Supreme, untroubled and secure,
'Mid heights and depths of love sublime,
'Mid joys that ever shall endure.

O for a rest from cares and tears,
From fainting hopes and sighs of woe—
A rest from anguish and from fears,
From pain and death and every foe.

O for that rest—that rest of love.—
By faith we now from toiling cease—
O then for pinions like a dove,
To fly away and be at peace!

For the Crisis.

The Coming Doom.

The world's stereotyped cry is a cry of peace and safety. It is ever the same. It was peace and safety when God shut Noah in the ark; peace and safety when he burned Sodom, smote Egypt, cast down Nineveh, overthrew Babylon, and destroyed Jerusalem; and so it will be peace and safety when sudden destruction cometh upon the world in that day of judgment which shall be revealed in flames of fire.

While the world has ever cried peace, God's prophets have always cried a sword! While the world has whispered safety, the prophets answer has been danger and alarm. "I came not to send peace on the earth, but a sword," is the language of Christ himself. He who reveres and understands God's word, sees in the light of that, things which no wise man of this world can by any human prescience divine.

The present aspect of the world is incomprehensible from any mere political point of view. Leaving God out of the account who can tell what a day, a year, or an age, may bring forth?

Thirteen years ago, (in 1848,) when kingdoms quaked at the march of revolution, and thrones tottered like shaken reeds, or fell like bowing walls; wise men, great men, and good men, hailed the lurid glare of revolution as the auroral splendor of a coming day, when liberty, equality and fraternity should be the universal heritage of man. Old tyrannies were falling, republics were rising, tri-colors were waving, and banners of freedom were bursting forth like blossoms from the boughs of spring; all this told of the good time coming, the millennium at hand, the utopian dreams of philanthropists about to be realized, and the voices of croakers and prophets of evil forever hushed. So spake the sages, so sang the poets, so taught the editors, so thundered the senators, so imagined the statesmen, so preached the ministers, so prayed the churches, so rhapsodized the orators, so proclaimed the societies, and so thought and said the people; but alas, the voice of the people was not the voice of God! I believed all this was a mere chimera—a vague, and vain, and fond delusion. Not because I was a statesman, or a philosopher, or a sage, but simply because I had read and searched the word of God. The world have since found out their sad mistake. Said Kossuth, "There is not a christian nation on the earth." Said H. W. Beecher, "The good time is coming, but not in your day or mine. Ten years ago I would not have said this, for then many good men believed that the millennium was almost here. But now conflicts are beginning. Never were there such munitions of war, never so many armed men upon the earth, since the world began."

suspense. What shall be the end of these wonders?

Still the hand moves on the great dial of time, not backwards but forwards;—not towards the peaceful scenes of worldly splendor, but towards the terrors of the day of doom. The great vessel is now amid whirlpools and storms; quicksands and shoals are not far distant; and, by the unfailing chart, the leeshore with all its terrors seems very near at hand. To-day, instead of a score of republics brightening Europe with their light, we see the stronghold of liberty in America the theatre of deadly internecine war. To-day, instead of gleaming tri-colors floating from the wilds of Siberia to the shores of the Atlantic and Mediterranean, we have even the boasted stars and stripes, despised, dishonored and trailing in the dust; instead of the innocent prattle and gentle arguments of peace societies, we have the swell of martial music, the thunder of artillery, and the tramp of armed men; instead of national congresses, world's fairs, and evangelical alliances, we have brother seeking his brother's blood, and nearly a million of American citizens in arms, waging a war marked, on one side at least, by rascality, madness and barbarity, from its beginning until now. Bribery and corruption, profligacy and recklessness in high places, have paved the way for villainy, treachery and rebellion, war, carnage, and impending ruin.

Yet the world cries "peace" amid it all. The constant answer of drowsy watchmen is, "All is well! All's well!!" Do the statesmen of the age comprehend the facts of the case? Do they take into account the justice of God, and the madness of man? I remember, in a tour at the west about a year ago, the present Secretary of State said, "They threaten to secede! Who's afraid? Nobody is frightened, and nobody is hurt." Did he understand the matter then? It is reported that he has said, since the commencement of this administration, that a few weeks would finish up the rebellion. Did he, when making his speeches at the west, believe that within the year of grace, 1861, a million of men would be armed in this country for mutual slaughter? Who would have believed it a year ago? Who can predict that the events of another year may not be as strange and terrible in their headlong rush as the occurrences of the year now passing away?

For one I am not surprised that these calamities have come. I have expected judgments on this nation. From the crushed hearts of the oppressed has gone up, these many years, the wailing plaint, "How long, O Lord, how long?" and more than politicians' rascality, or governmental rottenness has this cry for vengeance hastened the day of the dread calamity. The north and the south, scoffers at God's higher law, worshippers of the almighty dollar, partners in national crimes, are partakers of national punishment. The ill-gotten gain wrung from the toiling bondmen—the price of virtue, tears and blood, now melts away beneath the blast of God, and goes to arm the partners in iniquity for the work of mutual slaughter. And yet government ignores the fact of mutual guilt and divine judgment for it, and only longs to put things back as they were before! Have we yet seen the end of this matter? Have we seen the beginning of the end? God only knows, but I am in doubt of it. I am no prophet or alarmist, but I believe that the wine-cup of God's fury is now being pressed to the lips of a guilty nation, and God says to them, "Ye shall certainly drink." Some there are, indeed, who seem to me portents of a terrible storm at hand. Said Major General B. F. Butler, in a speech at Institute Hall, Roxbury, Mass., on Friday evening, October 25th—"In my judgment, unless this rebellion can be quelled and that within a short period, we shall become involved in a WAR SUCH AS THIS WORLD NEVER YET HAS SEEN, not only with the south, but with THOSE POWERS who, by lust of gain, will be induced to take part with it."

Whether this apprehension be well founded I cannot say. It is not the opinion of a fool, a fanatic, or a christian, but of a politician, a man of war. It may be as he supposes; and what are the prospects of a SPEEDY quelling of this rebellion? I think them rather dark. If one great European power should espouse one side of this quarrel, a second might the other, and ere long the world might be ablaze in the mighty conflagration. It is sad to think of such things, and yet it is useless to shut our eyes upon the coming doom.

While I hate slavery and rebellion, and sympathize with freedom and law, and [illegible] day, yet I dare not predict peace. [illegible] the world. [illegible]

now? Where is the pilot that can guide the ship? Who knows what is before us? I cannot predict—if I could who would believe my report? Years ago the world cried, freedom was at hand. It was false. They cried, the Millennium is dawning. It was false. They predicted harmony—national alliances, and peace congresses. It was false. The same men speak of speedy adjustments now. What is that?

If, three years ago, some prophet had predicted that before 1862 one million American citizens would be armed and engaged amid the horrors of mutual slaughter, who would have listened? who would have believed it? If it should be predicted that before another like period passes, the world would be at war, who would believe it? And yet would it be more strange? He that should predict the Battle of the great day of God Almighty in 1864, would perhaps find as many followers and believers as the man who predicted the present conflict two years ago. Who can predict? I cannot—I will not. But I see no signs of peace; no tokens of returning quiet. There may be a temporary calm—a transient lull; but God is at work in this matter. He rules the universe, and punishes his foes. Let us then cleave to Him as our only security.

We are living near the close of this dispensation; and its close is to be marked by desolation and by blood, by raging heathen, by angry nations, and by coming wrath. The mighty men are awakened to the fray, and the hour of doom seems gathering over and hasting on. "The great day of the Lord is near,—it is near, and hasteth greatly; even the voice of the day of the Lord. The mighty man shall cry there bitterly." Are we ready for that day? Are we separate from the world—pilgrim spectators of the impending strife? Are our interests with Christ? Are our treasures in heaven? Are our hearts and hopes there also? Are our hands clean and our garments spotless? Are we prepared to meet our Judge—the Judge of quick and dead? My unconverted friend, ponder these things. Let no man deceive you. The "manifest destiny" of earth's sinful nations is, to be dashed in pieces like potters' vessels by the iron rod of the King of kings. Come out, then, from the world. Lay hold on Christ. Let his blood of sprinkling be on your heart, and the destroying angel shall then pass over you unharmed. O, turn now, ere it is too late. My christian friend, awake! The day of doom is at hand. Work while time is lengthened out to you. Soon rewards and crowns will be bestowed. Before that hour, try, oh try, to save your friends, your family, yourself, and all around you. Be faithful. Scatter the light of God. Sell that ye have and give alms. Lay up treasures in heaven. Watch, as servants waiting for their Lord. Be diligent, that ye may be found of Him in peace.

May God lead us in all the ways of truth and duty, and help us to so abide in him that we may be safe amid the terrors of that day of coming doom. H. L. H.

One Died for All.

Who will die for a friend? Who will die for a stranger? Who will die for a foe? "Scarcely for a righteous man would one die, yet peradventure for a good man some might even dare to die. But God commendeth his love to us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us."

There have been a few instances where men have died for others; but such instances come mostly under the head of those who have tasted Christ's great love, and so have come to love others as he loved them. If He laid down his life for us, we ought also to lay down our lives for the brethren.

I remember reading an instance of most noble self-devotion in the case of a pilot on Lake Erie. John Maynard was well known in the Lake district as a God-fearing, honest, intelligent pilot. He was a pilot on a steamer from Detroit to Buffalo one summer afternoon. At that time those steamers seldom carried boats. When near Buffalo, smoke was seen ascending from below, and the captain called out, "Simpson, go down and see what that smoke is." Simpson came up with his face as pale as ashes, and said, "Captain, the ship is on fire." Then "Fire! fire! fire! fire on shipboard!" All hands were called up. Buckets of water were dashed upon the fire, but in vain. There were large quantities of rosin and tar on board, and it was useless to attempt to save the ship. The passengers rushed forward and inquired of the pilot, "How far are we from Buffalo?" "Seven miles." [illegible] children, crowded the extreme forward part of the ship. John Maynard stood alone at the helm. The flames burst forth in a sheet of fire; clouds of smoke arose; the captain cried out through his trumpet—"John Maynard!" "Ay, ay, sir!" "Are you at the helm?" "Ay, ay, sir!" "How does she head?" "Southeast-by-east, sir." "Head her southeast and run her on shore." Nearer, nearer, yet nearer she approached the shore. Again the captain cried out, "John Maynard!" The response came feebly, as from a dying man, "Ay, ay, sir!" "Can you hold five minutes longer, John?" "By God's help, I will!" The old man's hair was scorched from the scalp; one hand disabled, his knee upon the stanchion, and his teeth set, yet with his other hand upon the wheel, he stood firm as a rock. He steered the ship till she crashed upon the beach—every man, woman and child was saved, as John Maynard dropped, and his spirit returned to God who gave it.

Who can read, unmoved, the recital of such heroism as this? What heart would not bless the memory of such a noble man? And when that saved company landed on the shore, and gazed back upon their heroic deliverer wrapped in his winding sheet of flame, would not they read with a new interest the words, "If one died for all, then were all dead"? Would they not delight to honor the memory of a man so noble as that? Would they not love those whom he loved, and remember with sympathy those who remembered him with tears? And yet this man did only his duty. He died for all on board; but he might not have been able to save his own life had he sought to by leaving his post. His was the post of peril, and he met the responsibility and did his duty like a Christian hero.

But Christ did his work not through a sense of duty, but from love. He was safe, though we were perishing. He perished that we might be saved. He died for all, that the free gift—justification of life—might be granted to all, as really the condemnation of death had been passed upon all men through Adam's sin. If one died for all, all were dead—doomed to die without his interposition; and he died for us that we might not henceforth live unto ourselves but to Christ that died and rose again. O for a sense of this, not as a duty, to be reluctantly performed, but as a joyful service—the offspring of grateful love to our redeeming Lord. Christian, do you feel this? Christ died for you. Backslider, do you feel it? Christ died for you. Ah! poor, wandering Peter—while you are saying, "I know not the man," He is wearing the thorny crown and bleeding beneath the scourge for you. While you deny him, he prays "for thee, that thy faith fail not." While you curse and swear, he bleeds and groans and dies for you. But list! the agony is past, and as you come all abashed and ashamed before him, he, as loving as ever, says: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?"—"feed my sheep." O that a look from Christ may melt some poor wanderer's heart as he reads these lines, that he may weep, even as Peter wept, and as I, a poor wayward one, weep in penitential gladness at the thoughts of Jesus' love for me.

Sinner, Christ died for you. O, will you not live for him? Turn to him and seek his face. He loves you, and pities, and seeks to save you. May he bless you with repentance for sin, and save you in his glory at last, for his mercy's sake. Christian, live for Christ. Every day, hour, and moment let your life declare your love—let your acts tell your gratitude. And let all your toil be made a pleasure by the thought: I do this for the man that died for me—the man of pierced hands and thorn crowned head.

"If human kindness meets return,
And owns the grateful tie,
If tender thoughts within us burn
To feel a friend is nigh,—

O shall not warmer accents tell
The gratitude we owe
To Him who died, our fears to quell,
And save from death and woe?

While yet in anguish he surveyed
Those pangs, he would not flee;
What love those latest words displayed,
"Meet and remember me!"

Remember Thee—thy grief and pain
Our sin and shame to bear;
O Memory! leave no other name
But his, recorded there!"

COMFORT IN DEATH.—The Rev. Joseph Alleine having, shortly before his death, a conflict with Satan, said: "Away, thou foul fiend, thou enemy of all mankind, thou subtle sophister! Art thou come now to molest me, now I am just going—now I am at weak, and death upon me? Trouble me not, for I am none of thine! I am the Lord's. Christ is mine, and I am his—his by covenant. Enemies.

Many people have a great deal of fear and trouble and vexation about their enemies. No man, possessed of positive force of character and righteous principle, can pass through this world without having foes. What shall he do with them? Shall he fight them, hate them, and follow them? or, shall he let them alone? My opinion is, the latter is the wisest course. The following remarks from Alexander's Messenger, seem to hit the point exactly:

"Have you enemies? Go straight on and mind them not. If they block up your path, walk around them, and do your duty regardless of their spite. A man who has no enemies, is seldom good for any thing—he is made of that kind of material which is so easily worked that every one has a hand in it. A sterling character—one who thinks for himself, and speaks what he thinks, is always sure to have enemies. They are as necessary to him as fresh air; they keep him alive and active. A celebrated character, who was surrounded by enemies, used to remark:—'They are sparks which, if you do not blow, will go out of themselves.' Let this be your feeling, while endeavoring to live down the scandal of those who are bitter against you. If you stop to dispute, you do but as they desire, and open the way for more abuse. Let the poor fellows talk—there will be but a reaction, if you perform but your duty; and hundreds who were once alienated from you, will flock to you and acknowledge their error."

It is of little use to stop and stone every saucy puppy that runs after you with his impotent yelping. The more you pelt him the more he barks, while if you let him alone and pass on, you are soon out of hearing, while he stops his noise and waits for another object of abuse to appear, in the person of the next man who passes by.

I am reminded of a certain Dr. B——, of theological notoriety, who once, when passing on a road in the night, with a bundle of books in his handkerchief, was confronted by a small animal, of whose precise character he may not have had a definite idea. The Dr. stood his ground bravely, and so too his opponent made no effort to retreat. The Dr. at length, thinking to crush his foe at once, hurled a big book at him. The result was as might have been expected—the fire was returned, and did execution. The Dr. fared the worse for it, and went home with anything but "the odor of sanctity" about his garments, and found, no doubt, a long perfume as the result of his warlike experiment. But he learned a lesson. Years after some one assailed him in an intemperate and scurrilous pamphlet. His friends some of them urged him to reply to the man, and give him a severe castigation. "No," said the Dr., "I discharged a quarto volume at a skunk once, and have no disposition to repeat the operation." He wisely chose to let his assailant miss of the honor of being noticed by a respectable man. No doubt the poor pamphleteer concluded that he had shut the Dr.'s mouth, and that because he would not reply to his abuse he had nothing to say in his own behalf.

My friend, if you have foes, mind your own business, keep good natured, pray for them, do them good, and let them alone with all your might. This is my opinion on the matter. H. L. H.

A Rare Man.

The following is an extract from a speech made by Hon. David C. Broderick, late United States Senator from California, at Placerville, California. How many public men are there who can say as much?

"I have lived among you for more than ten years. From the commencement and during the period when the gross vices of public men were winked at or forgotten, on account of the general laxity of morals that prevailed in society, unleavened by the presence of virtuous women, no man, living or dead, ever saw me at the gaming table, or in a brothel, or under the influence of liquor, or even knew me to refuse to pay an honest bill. (Vehement and prolonged cheering.) No one ever dared to charge me with being influenced by pecuniary considerations in any vote which I gave. Can my traducers say as much?"

In these days of immorality, treason, plunder, defalcation and public rascality, it is almost strange to find a man in high position who dare assert such innocence of prevailing sins; and how sad is the fact that this very man was slain at last in a duel, the challenge to fight which, it seems he had not the moral courage to decline. O for the time when a King shall reign in righteousness and princes shall rule in judgment,—when an honest ruler shall be no longer a rarity. H. L. H.

Napoleon's Money Chest.

The following statement appears in an exchange, as taken from a respectable source—The Banker's Reporter. Whether it be true or not I cannot affirm. If Napoleon III. has found the Philosophers stone, he knows as well how to use the gold it produces for his own advantage as most other men. The article reads thus:

"It has been a great mystery to English bankers and to the Directors of the Bank of England, how the bullion of the Bank of France could be so greatly increased within the last three years, while the institution has been constantly sending gold to England, to Germany, and to America.

Not long since the Bank of France drew some fifteen million francs in silver from the Bank of England, which it paid for in gold bars with the French mint stamp on them. At its last report it showed a balance of one hundred and seventeen million francs in gold, while the amount one year ago was under eighty million—nearly one third increase. It is whispered that this abundance of gold is the result of a scientific discovery, which the Emperor Napoleon has secured the monopoly of.—Gold is at the present moment manufactured at Paris in a secret manner. The principle articles used are lead and arsenic, and though it is not known how extensively the precious metal is produced, yet several hundred weight of the material are taken to a certain place on the first of each month. Everything is conducted with the utmost secrecy. None of the workmen are allowed to leave, and nothing definite can be known; but the fact that gold is produced is beyond peradventure. How long Napoleon III. will be able to keep this wonderful secret remains to be seen."—Banker's Reporter.

It is said to be a fact, that for several years past, the annual gold coinage in France has been, I think, more than the total amount from California since the discovery of gold there. Americans have boasted and gloried in their gold fields, but France has said nothing, or made no stir about the matter. And yet, all this while, France has been coining more gold each year, than Americans have obtained in many years together. The reports from the mints, it is said, show this to be the fact.

Besides this, a few months ago, a French writer issued a pamphlet inquiring how much gold might be increased in quantity without a corresponding decrease in value—or how much gold could be used in the world without glutting the market. This inquiry indicates that France has plenty of gold.

Further: We hear no complaints in France of inordinate taxation, and Napoleon III. seems always to have money enough for the accomplishment of his grandest enterprises. He does not seem to rule by leave of money-lending Jews, but by virtue of his own power.

A lengthy article published in a New York paper some time ago, asserted that a man, I think Mr. R. A. Parish, of Philadelphia, by careful study of the geological structure of the earth, had decided that certain localities, similar in geological character to the various known gold regions, must also contain deposits of the same precious metal. He undertook to lay the matter before the governments of this country and Great Britain, but failed to obtain any recognition of its importance, until he visited Louis Napoleon, who gave him attention, and referred the subject to persons conversant with such topics. A fabulous amount was promised him for his information, but he could never come to a definite arrangement, or get one franc of the offered bounty. They learned, however, that he regarded some of the interior regions of Africa as the most eligible locations for gold mining. Soon after this it was noticed that France, with marvelous quietness, and without the least parade, was pushing colonies into those regions, and then came the astounding increase in the coinage of the French mint, the statistics of which were given in the article in question. The above paragraph has recalled the subject to my mind. How the case really stands, I do not pretend to know, but I give the statements as perhaps shedding light upon the question. One thing seems quite evident—the Emperor of France has plenty of money—how he gets it is another question, which I do not undertake to decide. The fact that he has the money is the important one. What will he do with it? Will he carry out the Napoleonic ideas of his uncle? Will he strike for the Empire of the East? Will he seek to do according to his will among all these old and effete nationalities?

Napoleon loses no advantages once gained. He holds his ground and [illegible]

Arabic newspaper, published, I believe, at Beirut, but printed in FRANCE, where papers are not printed unless allowed by Imperial authority. Those savages, too, who butchered helpless christians there without mercy, were found to be armed with muskets bearing the government stamp of France! How came those arms in their hands? When the mischief was done, Napoleon was very willing, with England, to take the whole under his protecting care. What is his object?

He is now using his gold in the creation of an immense navy. Awhile ago the British learned that he was building a huge vessel, "La Gloire," which was to be plated with steel and impervious to shot and shell. The British began to fear lest their naval supremacy should be interfered with. So they ordered the construction of "The Warrior," a vessel of the same kind, as an offset to the other; when lo, it transpired that Napoleon had already given orders for the construction of several other vessels of the same general character. His vast accommodations for his immense navy are entirely unparallelled. Besides the magnificent harbor at Brest, large enough to afford anchorage for a host of vessels, he has been, of late, constructing other important naval depots and accommodations. At CHERBOURG he has prepared a harbor which contains forty-eight acres of deep water, where the largest vessels may ride in security. At TOULON, he is preparing another harbor which will, it is said, contain when finished, some thirty-two acres more—making some eighty acres of deep water for large vessels of war, including five immense basins, and numerous docks, etc., besides the spacious harbor at Brest. Those persons who think this is all for nothing, know little of the character and designs of Napoleon the Third.

What shall be the end of these things? What will Napoleon do with his standing army of six hundred thousand men? What will he do with his one hundred and seventy field batteries, and his thirty thousand national guards? What will he do with his vast and increasing navy—with his four hundred and twenty-five vessels of war, and his thirty thousand trained seamen that he holds at his command? What will the other European nations do with their forces? What will he do with his enormous riches, his warlike hordes, and his "many ships"? Will he come to America to meddle with our quarrels? Will he plunge into a strife that shall make work for the four million and a half of Europe's standing armies, and their twelve hundred and ninety-five vessels of war?

Or will he turn his face toward the Orient? Will he think to reconstitute the Empire of the East, and gather all the barbaric splendor of antiquity into a new government more mighty than all before it? To-day, it is said, he holds a title to land upon the summit of Mount Zion. Will he seek to set his throne upon that spot? To-day his banner floats above that sacred height—will he yet seek to plant the tabernacles of his palace there? Will he there come to his end at last, withered by the blast of God? Will Michael, the Great Prince, then arise to deliver his people from the terrors of the "time of trouble" such as never was? Will the sleeping multitudes then awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt? Will the teachers, and those that turn many to righteousness, then shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars forever and ever?

These things I cannot decide. These questions I cannot answer. I cannot predict. I am not a prophet, still I can observe, and I do it with an interest that leads me to cry, with the Prophet, who foretold such events, "O MY LORD, WHAT SHALL BE THE END OF THESE THINGS?"

Have Confidence in God.

"Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away; all these things are against me."

Thus, in the bitterness of his soul, exclaimed the sorrowful patriarch of Canaan. The children of his beloved Rachel were especially precious in his sight. Many years had passed since his heart first bled for Joseph, his first born, believing him to have become food for the wild beasts of the forest. Simeon was now detained a prisoner in Egypt, to insure the means of life to the patriarch and the remaining part of his family. Next comes a pressing demand for his pet—his darling—the youngest; and all that now remained of his beautiful and loving Rachel must be risked, or himself and family must perish for want of bread. What a conflict now rages within the breast of him who had ere this courageously wrestled with an angel, and for his God-like valor obtained the name of Israel.

"How cruel!" the enemy whispers; and perhaps suggested the same unbelieving inquiry he subsequently did to the sweet Singer of Israel while wrapt in adversity's sable folds,—"Where is now thy God?" All the providences of God now seem arrayed against him, he thinks. He is tempted to discredit the idea of God's loving kindness, because he is chastened. He cannot now believe that the dense, dark cloud which hangs so portentously over him will ever "break in blessings on his head." No, no. This dark train of circumstances seems proof positive that that God who had formerly extricated him from many a fearful dilemma has now forsaken him. It must be conceded that this is indeed a trying time for the hoary headed father. But why will he not take a retrospective glance at the merciful interpositions of Deity when his circumstances were as straitened as the present, and thereby gain a little strength to learn to "trust" the God of Abraham and his father Isaac "where he cannot trace him"? Has not the Lord thus far been very pitiful, and of tender mercy? Why could he not, like David, when the billows had almost gone over him, remember the land of Jordan and the little hill, Mizer, where God did wonderfully manifest himself in his behalf, thus causing "Hope" to plume her golden pinions and soar with the confidence that "the Lord will command his loving kindness," etc? Ps. 92: 8. Has he forgotten the time when with tearful eye he bade adieu to the paternal roof and journeyed in a land of strangers; and as he laid himself upon his stony pillow to seek Nature's restorer, without one friend to soothe his homesick heart, friends of a higher order were commissioned to descend from their celestial paradise to gladden his sorrowful heart? Meantime the great I AM drew aside his curtain and spake audibly in his ear, reminding him that he was the same God who made the promises to his grandfather Abraham and his father Isaac; then renews the promise to himself declaring he would be with and sustain him in all places, etc. Has he forgotten how literally this promise was fulfilled through his entire sojourn in Syria, while laboring for the selfish Laban? How God himself reproved this covetous man when he was about to return to his own country, and, as he drew nearer home, how wonderfully the grace of God was manifest in restraining his enraged brother, besides a multitudinous number of daily mercies?

It would seem impossible that these multifarious blessings should be wholly effaced from his mind; but he so far allows the sorrowful present to quench or eclipse his sense of past mercies and future promises, as to make him feel somewhat captious and moody, if we may judge from his language on this occasion. Hear him scold Judah for telling the lord of Egypt that he had such a brother as Benjamin, when he knew the circumstances rendered it necessary to do so. Then impatiently declares that Benjamin should not go down into Egypt. But pinching hunger and gaunt famine proved a necessary stimulus, and so far modified his temerity that he recalled the hasty declaration his lips had uttered in time of temptation, and consented to have his dear darling go with them.

The sequel is well known. This very grievous train of circumstances, to him dark as the impenetrable gloom of hades, was just what he needed for the salvation of himself and family. What an invaluable lesson should this inspired history teach us. And shall not God's children improve by this heavenly bequest? The patriarch Jacob was not privileged with reading such history to stimulate his faith, while we are favored with many precedents of like character, interspersed with many precious promises to lure us on until we shall all stand arrayed complete in immortality. But in view of all the promises interspersed with many examples, promises for the necessities of this life, and of future blessedness with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, yet when dark clouds lower, and adverse winds fill our path with thorns, instead of acknowledging the necessity of chastisement, or exhibiting confidence that he who hath safely carried us through the sixth trouble has promised to stand by us in the seventh, we cry out with Jacob, "all these things are against me." Whereas, it may be the very thing we need to [illegible] fit us for the society of the redeemed. How many times when sickness has laid us on the shelf for a season, when perhaps we thought we could not be spared, have we felt and perhaps gave utterance to the same, "now this is very much against me." But for one, I can testify that sickness has procured for me great and unlooked for blessings, much as I dread its palsying grasp.

Again, when business affairs have given a contrary phase from what we desired, then we have given place to the feeling. "This is against me." But how often have we heard business men declare that, if they had succeeded in carrying out their plans which they deemed indispensable, it would have ruined them financially. But when death has laid our loved ones in the grave, then it was that we were positive that so distressing an event was greatly against us. But let us rejoice, while passing through this disordered Baca, that we have so provident a Father, anticipating and preparing a balm for every wound, and so arranging that his every providence shall benefit us. He declares, and let us believe it, that "ALL things work together for good to them that love God." And again, "I will NEVER leave thee nor forsake thee." If we really believe these two passages of Scripture, happy indeed shall we be.

Eld. Howell's Tour and renewed Illness.

The following touching letter from Sister Howell will be read with deep interest. And while we cannot "the words of our brother forget," nor the long years of faithful, earnest labor he has given to a holy cause, we bespeak for him and his companion a large place in the sympathy and prayers of our readers. Let them be generously remembered after a godly sort. Their P. O. address is, Harvard, McHenry Co., Illinois.—ED.

DEAR BRO. WENDELL:—Many of our friends, knowing the feeble state of my husband's health, have expressed a wish to know how he endured the journey West. As I have not time to inform them individually, I beg leave to do so collectively through the "Crisis."

We took leave of the family of our dear Bro. Parry, at Sandy Hill, on the morning of the 16th, of Oct., and arrived at Detroit the next morning—too late for the train to Chicago, and were consequently obliged to wait until evening. During the afternoon Mr. Howell was attacked with hemorrhage of the lungs in the Detroit depot. He was conveyed to the hotel near by, where he bled five times in twenty-four hours. It was a dark night of watching to me, as I stood over my poor, fainting companion, expecting every hour would be his last. In a strange city and strange house, and among strangers, I did not know what to do, but tried to send a telegram to my father to have him come to my assistance; but the message was brought back to me with the remark, "there is no telegraph office in Harvard," (which, by the way, is a mistake.) I supposed he would die there, and thought we might as well proceed on our journey. We accordingly took the boat, supposing it would be easier for him than the cars. We went on board on Friday, and on Saturday afternoon the bleeding commenced worse than before. I tried every means in my power to check it, but in vain; at every motion of the boat the blood poured from his mouth frightfully. A death like pallor overspread his countenance; he turned his glassy eyes to my face and said, "I think it will take me off this time," and requested me to have him carried home. I promised to do so, and told him I had done all I could, and we must now trust the great Physician. He asked me to pray. I felt truly that I could pray. It was an awful moment, never to be forgotten,—my husband seemingly about to close his eyes in death, not one sympathizing friend near, on the broad lake, with two long days and three long tedious nights before us, before we could possibly reach the shore. I felt that it was a moment when I could throw my poor unworthy self upon the promises of Jehovah and trust. In a few moments the dark veil seemed to be lifted. Mr. Howell looked up and said, "I believe Jesus will not let me die here." My heart at that moment was filled with a peace which this world could neither give nor take away. I praised the Lord with a loud voice. The bleeding stopped for that time, but it seemed as if our faith must be tested till the last. He bled again the next day, and twice the next night. On Tuesday morning we reached Chicago—were conveyed to the cars, and by constantly applying ice to my husband's chest I kept him alive until we reached home, on the 22d of Oct. I had watched five days and nights without sleep.

He often expressed a desire to live until he reached home, which, through the goodness of God, was granted. He bled again that afternoon, but since that time he has been quiet. He is perfectly prostrate, though I still indulge a hope that his life may be prolonged in this climate for a season. His work is done. He has, no doubt, preached his last sermon. The future looks dark, but we trust in Israel's God. It seems as though my trials have been all I could bear, but perhaps my cup is not yet full. I desire an interest in the prayers of my brethren and sisters, for myself and companion, that our faith fail not.

Well, dear reader, we are glad to salute you again with our kind wishes, after the lapse of six months, and hope our future acquaintance will be even more pleasant, profitable and endearing, than that of the past. In company with our worthy associate, Bro. P. B. Morgan, we shall spare no pains to make our weekly visits desirable to all our readers; so that when they have perused our columns, they will feel as when they return from a good prayer meeting, where christian pilgrims have cheered each other with stirring testimony and song. When we arrive at your dwellings, we wish to cause a thrill of joy to every heart, that sympathizes with Jesus and his coming; so much so, that each one will be so glad of our visits, that they will feel they must stop all business for awhile, till we have had a pleasing chat together; and then when evening comes, invite in the neighbors, and all gather around the table in delightful cheer, to hear the news, as when absent loved ones come home.

We shall not aim to be learned in our talk with you, but good; neither do we intend to criticise what you say, nor provoke a dispute with any one to mar the sweet peace of our happy union. On account of the different tastes and callings of the members of our great family, composed of thousands of christian disciples, we must expect a variety of topics will be introduced for consideration; some of which will not be at all interesting to a portion of the company, while others will be deeply interested; hence, we shall all have a fine opportunity for the exercise of patience, long-suffering, and forbearance, thus proving we are christians, and worthy of each other's confidence.

Like strangers in a foreign land, attacked by enemies on every side, let us unite as one man to sustain the glorious truth of the Lord, committed to our trust; be firm and immovable in its defence, leaving all the consequences and results in the hands of the Captain of our salvation. In short, "let us do right if the heavens fall." We fancy we hear an earnest amen to this sentiment; and be assured, we echo a most hearty response. It is a great privilege to be associated, as we are, with such noble-hearted souls, who love the truth and are ready to sacrifice their all rather than give up the "blessed hope." With the consciousness that we enjoy the sympathies of such a company, and the comfort of the Holy Spirit, labor becomes a pleasure, and self-denial for their good, a luxury.

We hope to be able to make the Crisis such a paper as every reader will take pleasure in lending to his neighbors and friends. Come, let us all unite with renewed zeal to spread the last great message to a dying world,—"Behold the Bridegroom cometh." We have but a narrow margin of time left us in which to do the remainder of our work. Soon the reaping angels will begin their work. Let every watchman gird himself anew for the coming conflict between truth and error, right and wrong, light and darkness. Let us be christian heroes. By the help of the Lord, we give our heart and hand anew to this cause. We love the work, the company, and the truths we advocate. With us, the speedy coming of the Lord is no speculative idea, but one of the settled principles in our belief. We see no chance for any doubt in this matter; and every month the evidence increases.

Brethren, let us be true to our high calling in giving the final proclamation to the inhabitants of this planet; and soon it will be said, "Well done," by him who speaks with power to raise the dead. We must expect a stormy way to the close of this dispensation, as it is Satan's last great struggle for mastery. No effort will be wanting on his part, to keep us from inheriting the kingdom. Let there be a corresponding activity on our part, with an increase of prayer and watchfulness, and soon we'll sing, "All's well."

Once more we say pray for us, that we may be able to give the churches meat in due season; that we may have special wisdom and courage to do all to the glory of God, and be guided solely by this motive. Be so kind as to throw charity's mantle over our faults and mistakes, while in christian love we press on together for the prize in the land of glory, where partings are o'er, and sorrows, pain, sickness ann death are forever unknown. G.

The Advent Christian Association, lately convened at Worcester, having seen proper to appoint to to me the responsibilities and duties of a post in the Editorial department of "The World's Crisis," under the cognomen of Associate Editor, it may be becoming I should add a few words to the salutatory already written, making my individual obeisance to the readers of our paper.

Little needs to be said by way of addition to the greeting now presented by my faithful and experienced colleague; but I may add that, while less experienced, and may on many accounts defer much to the maturer judgment of my associate, I am myself not insensible either to the power of the press or to the responsibilities imposed upon me by my constituents.

It is now that, "To be living is sublime." While the fearfulness that is shortly to seize all hearts, as they "look after those things which are coming," is already beginning to be seen,—while the world's forces are marshaling for the last conflict, and God about to send back to earth Him who shall be the avenger of all wrongs, and who is the rightful heir to the throne of David,—now to be living, and amidst all to be constantly acting well the part of a disciple of Christ, is indeed sublime. To aid us in thus living, we need all the helps God is pleased to grant us. And since it is now almost universally conceded that the press is the most powerful means put into the hands of man (the sword only excepted) "for good or evil," it is due you that those whom you have appointed the conductors of your own paper should spare no pains their ability will allow in properly directing this engine of power, and making its columns what the times, the students of prophecy, and a christian public demand.

While then this will be our aim, I shall unite with the senior Editor in asking the co-operation and prayers of our brethren: not to be fettered by the public,—for we shall claim our independence and prerogatives as editors, and try to do the best we can under existing circumstances; yet, while we refuse acquaintance with all intrusive and officious meddlers, we crave to give that tone and dignity to this sheet that can only be given by the hearty co-operation, kindly counsel and support of an intelligent and generous-minded public. We have able contributors who have written for this sheet; we hope for their best thoughts in the same way again. There are those who have prayed for this enterprise; brethren, we beg you pray again and often for the same. And thus while our columns shall go forth teeming with the intelligence you need, and the Lord wishes you to have, we hope they will breathe the frank, independent, ennobling, and Christ-like spirit, that shall not wholly disappoint our constituents, nor render our acquaintance with our readers otherwise than mutually agreeable, and mutually for our good. M.

INITIALS.—Our special friends may be interested to know that the Editors of the Crisis have, with the council of brethren, mutually agreed to attach the last initial of their respective names [in small caps] to their individual productions.

To our Contributors.

We would say to those who have enriched the columns of the "Crisis" with their valuable productions, that our stock is now very low, and needs to be replenished immediately. To-night, to-day, take the pen and send us a few lines. We do not ask for long articles, but many short ones. Come, dear Brn. and Srs., let us renew the war against Satan's kingdom the coming autumn and winter with such energy as we have never shown before. Let every spare moment for writing be improved, every rich thought be treasured for use, baptized with prayer, clothed with love, and hastened to our reach, that they may be scattered as autumn leaves to cheer the fainting ones who are tempted sore on every side, and have not seen a cloud with "silver lining" for many a day. Come, do send your heart-cheering, soul-stirring articles, that shall gladden the widow's lonely hours, and give joy to the homeless ones. Remember, a large number of our readers hear no preaching from those who love the appearing of Jesus; hence the stirring articles from your pens are sources of great comfort to them, and may be the means of causing many to endure to the end, who might otherwise miss the prize. Now is the time for action. G.

"The World's Crisis."

When we look over the world and compare its present position with the prophetic word of the Lord, we think no title more appropriate for our family paper than the one now standing at its head. Truly we have come within the circling eddies of the world's crisis, which is to end in the coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the setting up of the everlasting kingdom. The events about to transpire are not to be confined to some particular locality, as in the destruction of Sodom and Jerusalem, but the whole world is to share in the overwhelming revolution. It is not a few bankers, merchants, mechanics or farmers, who are feeling the panic, occasioned by the "hard times, but the whole world is aroused, and its eternal interests are soon to be decided. The events foretold by prophets thousands of years ago, which have been the objects of fond anticipation by the saints, and of dread by the ungodly, are now about to open to our astonished vision. Well has the poet said,

"To be living is sublime."

Almost every day unfolds something new relative to the great day of the Lord, which, as all things now indicate, is not far off. Some twenty chains of prophecy are all concentrating to a focus not far from the times in which we live. All things proclaim in thunder tones, the last days have come, and their perils surround us. He who sleeps now, and conforms to the world, does it at the risk of losing eternal life. This is the hour for watchfulness and prayer. But amid all the startling signs of the times, the followers of Christ will find it requires constant effort to keep awake. Now is the time to heed the instruction, which requires us to exhort "one another, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching." This implies that signs will clearly indicate when the day is near. We are living, without doubt, in the very time to which our Lord referred. We see no room for doubt on this point. The very prophecies that prove the Bible true, also demonstrate that the end of the present dispensation will transpire within a brief period. No bright beams illumine the dark clouds that hang over the world. We see no ground to hope for better times till Jesus comes. But, thank the Lord, we have reached the point where we can "lift up" our "heads" and rejoice, knowing that our "redemption draweth nigh." The Lord is still the hope of his people. "All things work together for good to them that love God." This promise is true as ever. G.

JACOBS' PATENT PORTFOLIO PAPER FILE.—Mr. Jacobs will please accept our thanks for the very convenient Newspaper File with which he has favored us. It is just what we wanted.

We would say to our readers, who wish to preserve their papers, that Jacobs' Portfolio is the very thing they need. It will hold a year's numbers; and for durability, elegance, and convenience, is nearly equal to the best binding. He makes them all sizes, from the size of letter paper to the largest newspaper. Any letters, music, or other documents, are neatly bound by this arrangement, and preserved for future examination.

Our Difficulties.

Those who are called to sound the last alarm to a guilty world, as did Noah to the Antediluvians, or Lot to the inhabitants of Sodom, find many difficulties to encounter, well calculated to dishearten and discourage the faint-hearted disciple, and turn back the wavering ones. Those who engage to defend the truth in its final conflict against error, must clothe themselves with "the whole armor of God," put reputation, friends, property, time, talents, and even life itself upon the altar, and go forth fearlessly, trusting in the Lord alone for success, and then they are sure to stand among the triumphant at last, when the Son of God is crowned "King of kings." This is the time for brave men to act, for the faithful to be firm for the right. Let there be no wavering, no doubtful ones; but let us all "stand up for Jesus," regardless of the consequences. As Paul says, "Quit you like men." Do not be childish in these last hours of the struggle. Remember, He that is for us is more than all that can be against us. He who falters now does it at the risk of losing eternal life. Can any one, who sees the light, be so foolish as to peril his all to save a worthless reputation gained from the enemies of the cross of Christ? Will he barter away eternal glory in the kingdom of God for such a bauble? Is it possible that he will quail before the finger of scorn, or biting reproach of those who are "as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed," who "speak evil of the things that they understand not;" who "shall utterly perish in their own corruption?" Let us not thus disgrace ourselves by such cowardice. Be men indeed.

The following truthful remarks are from the last number of the Voice of the Prophets:—

"Our greatest difficulty in extending the cause, by a living, aggressive movement, will arise from a want of the living baptism and unction, with a healthful, vigorous faith in the time of the certain and speedy coming of Christ. It is saddening to see the turn that things are taking with many who have enjoyed the light. The stirring events of this time, affecting the whole world, seem only to put many to sleep. The great rebellion in our own land, which absorbs all the sympathies of the masses, seems also to divert our attention from the better government soon to be established by the Son of man. One of the very signs which should have quickened us in our work has rather absorbed the attention, and diverted us in some measure from it. The present blindness and apathy on the speedy coming of Christ is really alarming. And unless God pour out his Spirit, and awake the slumbering virgins, he will hardly find faith on earth, even among many Adventists, at his coming. The professed oracles of the Advent message, also, to an alarming extent, are dumb, as to anything positive, aggressive, or effective. Must we thus slumber over this subject in this last hour? Shall we, by our inactivity, make it necessary for the Master of the vineyard to raise up other laborers? Must new and effective instrumentalities be called into the field to finish the work of the last proclamation? Or shall we awake, and enter upon the work with new zeal and effectiveness? I put these questions to all who have been enlightened on this great subject. Will you awake, and put forth all your strength in this work? 'Faith without works is dead.' Let not our religion be cold, heartless, and delusive. Christ is coming, and we must be ready, or fail of the kingdom?" G.

Visit in New Hampshire.

But for our recent illness, we should have prepared a detailed account of our deeply interesting visit among the churches of the "Old Granite State." From Sept. 17th to the 27th, we spent with the churches in this State which were before strangers to us, visiting at Lake Village, Merideth Neck, Tuftonborough, Barnstead, and New Durham Ridge; in each of which places we found a goodly company waiting the coming of the Lord, many of them "strong in the faith, giving glory to God."

Our chief meeting was at Barnstead, which, commencing on Friday, continued over the Sabbath and into the following week, the interest increasing with the progress of the meeting, souls being converted, and the members of Christ re-united. We had the pleasure of meeting upon this occasion Eld.'s Smith, Piper, Pinkham, Holt, Simpson, Mooney, Leavett, Glitton, Glazier, Manning and Badge, most of whom we met now for the first time. God grant the acquaintance may be continued in the kingdom! Seldom have we witnessed more faith in God, and more visible manifestations of his presence in return—in spiritual utterances, in healings, in the melting of hearts, and in the conversion of sinners.

"All glory be to the Lord on high!"

We were surprised at the number of churches and chapels we found in this region of New Hampshire; and were constantly impressed with the robust character of the christianity professed and taught by the brethren present. We venture the prophecy that, while the granite hills of New Hampshire remain on their base, so long will there be faith in that State in the soon coming of the Lord.

Our brethren at Barnstead occupy a large and commodious house of worship in company with the Free-will Baptist brethren. Bro. Mooney is their pastor, and has every prospect of a prosperous time.

During our stay a company of brethren went with us to a high eminence on New Durham Ridge, where was spread before us—not all the kingdoms of the world, but one of the most magnificent dioramas that was ever seen before by us. Sixty miles to the north were the White Mountains, standing in all their awful majesty—fit symbol of Zion, that "shall never be removed." At our feet lay the beautiful sheet of water, Lake Winnipiseogee—said by British tourists to be unsurpassed by the most famed lakes of Scotland,—while thirty miles at our right lay the blue waves of the Atlantic, and far at our left lay what we were disposed to take for the mountains of Vermont. But with all this enchanting and almost bewitching scenery before us—the like of which we never see without fresh visions of the "Beautiful world" toward which we journey,—there was still nothing so deeply and incessantly impressed our mind as the thought that, at the very base of this summit, was the very meeting-house, and too the dwelling house, occupied by the estimable I. E. Jones, who, when first the tidings of the soon coming of our Lord fell upon his ears, left all—and that was much, too—to spread abroad the glad tidings. We could not forget our brother, now on the prairies of the west; and while we remembered him, we found it in our heart to pray—"God bless him." We were glad to hear his name spoken by old friends with so much tender, christian regard. Perhaps there is no man that would receive a warmer welcome home, than would Eld. Jones in Alton.

But, to conclude our narrative, we wish to say we find ourselves obligated to several brethren for their kindness, but shall hope that we may together reap fruits in the great day of harvest. M.

"Behold He Cometh!"

Where is there a more sublime idea, or an enunciation more pregnant with grand and awful thought than is found in the declaration, "Behold He cometh!" But it is when we take into consideration the world of evidence that the statement is shortly and suddenly to be a reality, that the words come home to our hearts with an overwhelming power.

A few years ago, many of us heard, it may be, some humble lecturer,—perhaps, to that time, a layman—who in a general way expounded to us the prophecies, and showed us the signs of the times indicative of the soon coming of the Lord. We were astonished. We canvassed the subject again and again. We heard of few learned men speaking in favor of the doctrine, but of many speaking against it. But after our best investigations of the subject with Bible in hand, it seemed to us to be clearly taught by the word of God, and that was enough. The great fact, to us, was all-absorbing. Our hearts were laid upon God's altar, and to us there were no sacrifices too great to make for truths so precious. And in the midst of obloquy and opposition, unmeasured and incalculable, we confessed to the world we were waiting for the Son of God from heaven. The world was at first astonished, and thousands took warning; and, (like the writer of this,) turned to God with full purpose of heart. But the mass soon learned to scoff as in the days of Noah.

But to-day how changed the aspect! Not that the world is without scoffers, who are saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?"—nor that the truth is without opposition; but instead of a humble few, standing alone, not knowing there were five hundred persons on all the earth believing like themselves, behold seventy thousand in the United States and Canadas now looking for the return of the Nobleman! Behold the most venerable, the most erudite, and the most eloquent of which the world can boast crying the same cry—"Behold He cometh!" This is true in the Lutheran church of Germany; in the church of Scotland; and of the English church; as also of many of branches of the Christian church of America.

Ah! this is a propitious day for the waiting ones. Never did heaven and earth conjointly tell in plainer, in more unmistakable terms, than now. Sun, moon and stars, clouds and vapor, belligerant nations and decaying christianity, and the universal corruption of morals, together with the running out of every line of prophecy, ought to afford evidence that should make even a skeptic blush, so perfectly indubitable are the evidences not only in favor of the authenticity of the Scriptures, but of our present position in the prophetic calendar. As said the Boston Journal a few weeks since, "The world is one vast camp"; and we may add, it only remains for God to issue his mandate, and the agitating elements of the world are loosed, the nations rush, and the cry, "Behold he cometh!" is a reality. M.

"He cometh, cometh speedy,"

☞ Bro. Grant being necessarily absent for a few days, and Bro. Morgan being just recovering from a serious illness, the preparation of the first and last pages of this paper has devolved upon H. L. GEO. T. ADAMS, Treasurer.

On motion, the Editor, R. Wendell, made his report as business Ag't for the C. P. S., giving such explanations and facts as questions asked required. Adjourned to meet at Warren Hall to morrow at 8 1-2 A. M. Those assembled then listened to an appropriate discourse from Eld. Miles Grant, founded on Rom. 8: 9.

Oct. 16th, Warren Hall, Worcester, 8 1-2 A. M. Opened by reading the Scriptures (1 Cor. 13) by the Chair, and prayer by Eld. H. Pratt. The business before the meeting last night on adjournment was taken up. The Treasurer's report accepted. The Editor's report, as business Ag't for the C. P. S. was referred to that Society for their disposal, to be reported to the A. C. A.

On motion, the minutes of the C. P. S. were read and accepted, whereupon remarks were made by Brn. Hastings, Brown, Hemenway, W. Pratt, Grant, Adams, Wellcome, and others as to the efficiency of that society. Bro. Jos. T. Rice coming in from Nova Scotia, but not properly sent as delegate from his church, yet expected to represent them, on the recommend of Eld. Brewer, it was voted to receive him as a member of the Association. Adjourned till 2 P. M.

2 P. M. Opened by prayer, led by Eld. J. D. Merriam. Discussion resumed upon the Minutes of the C. P. S., after which said Minutes were laid upon the table, that letters addressed to the Association from churches, conferences, and preachers, might be read. Letters were then read from P. A. Smith, Rochester, N. Y., L. Boutell, W. H. Mitchell, O. R. Fassett, Wm. Mitchell, C. P. Dow, Stanbridge, C. E., from the Iowa, Minn. and Wis. Annual Conference, the R. I. Quarterly Conference, and from churches in Rutland and Poultney, Vt., Hamlin and Rochester, N. Y., Danville and Lawrenceville, C. E., Portland, Me., and Boston. On motion, Bro. Wendell represented the Albany church. The Minutes of the C. P. S. were then taken up and indefinitely postponed. Adjourned to meet at 6 1-2 P. M.

6 1-2 P. M. Opened by prayer, offered by Eld. H. Munger. Thomas Weaver was received as a delegate from the Worcester (Warren Hall) church. It was then Voted, That the following resolution be considered an additional article of the constitution, viz.,

Resolved, That the Editor, or Editors, of the World's Crisis, shall be chosen by ballot at the annual meeting of the A. C. A., or at any special meeting called for that purpose, provided that six weeks notice be given of the same through the columns of the Crisis. It was also Voted, That said article be numbered the eighth in the constitution. The constitution was then so amended in Art. III. by a two-thirds vote as to read, The Officers of this Society shall be a President, Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, and nine Directors, who, together with the Editor, or Editors, shall constitute a Board of Managers.

Voted, That the Chair appoint a Committee of seven to draw up and present to this Association a system of regulations in the form of resolutions, by which they wish the Editor, or Editors, and Editorial Committee to be governed in the management of the Crisis. Moved and seconded that Art. IV of the constitution be amended in these words; viz., "And such church, living at such a distance that they cannot be conveniently represented by a delegate from among themselves, may vote by written ... they may designate," whether ... among them or not. Laid on the table. Adjourned to meet after preaching.

Eld. H. L. Hastings then addressed the assembly, in a most powerful and impressive manner, from 2. Cor. 1: 18, showing the danger and folly of saying "nay," when God says "yes," making a forcible application of it to the practice of explaining away scriptural assertions in reference to the Coming of Christ, Kingdom of God, Death, and the Resurrection of the dead, and Day of Judgment.

9 o'clock P. M. The Association resumed its business. The Chair reported M. Grant, I. C. Wellcome, H. Pratt, F. H. Berick, J. Hemenway, Geo. T. Adams, A. M. Higgins, as Committee on Editorial regulations. Eld. Wendell tendered his resignation as Editor and business Ag't of the C. P. S., stating that this had been his settled purpose for some time. Eld. Grant tendered his resignation as Assistant Editor. The resignations of Eld.'s Wendell and Grant were accepted, to take effect Nov. 1st, 1861. The Association then proceeded to ballot for a new Editor. Brn. Brown, Adams, and Goodrich, were appointed committee on ballots. Ballots were received at the call of the roll. Under a motion to suspend, it was voted, that a two-thirds vote be required to elect an Editor. The result of ballot reported as follows; viz., whole number votes cast, 51; necessary for choice 34; F. H. Berick 26, M. Grant 20, D. T. Taylor 3, A. Flavel 1, P. B. Morgan 1,—no choice. A new ballot was taken with the following result: whole number votes 49; necessary for choice, 32; Berick 27; Grant 22,—no choice; whereupon, the meeting adjourned till to-morrow, at 8 1-2 A. M.

Oct. 17th, 8 1-2 A. M. Opened by prayer, offered by Eld. S. B. Munn. The meeting then enquired of Eld.'s Berick and Grant if they would act together as associate Editors of the Crisis. Eld. Berick declined. Eld. D. T. Taylor was proposed as Editor but he declined on account of ill health. Moved and seconded that Eld. Berick be Editor, and Eld. Grant Ass't Editor; after some discussion it was laid on the table.

Committee on Editorial Regulations reported as follows:—Whereas the World's Crisis was originated mainly to publish the doctrine of the immediate, personal advent of the Son of God from heaven, and the evidences of the same; and as we believe the demand is now still more important than at that time, therefore

Resolved, That the proclamation of this doctrine should be made the leading subject by its Editor or Editors, and contributors of the paper.

Second:—That those who write for the columns of the Crisis are requested to avoid all personal allusions calculated to wound the feelings of the most sensitive.

Third:—That as persons who write for the Crisis are not pleased when their articles are reviewed by the Editor or others, it is desired that all reviews be avoided.

Fourth:—That as controversial articles are calculated to awaken personal feelings and cause divisions in the church of Christ, it is recommended that all such articles be avoided, and that the contributors to the Crisis, who differ in their views, express their opinions freely, without any attack upon those who entertain opposite sentiments.

Fifth:—That all monies for the Publication Society shall pass through the hands of one of the Editors of the Crisis, and be paid over to the Treasurer.

Sixth:—That the Editors shall be responsible for the inaccuracies of the Clerk's department concerning the business of the Crisis Office.

Report laid on table, and the meeting proceeded to ballot again for Editor. Each member was requested to express upon his ballot his wish concerning the Editorial Department. Under a motion to suspend, and at the suggestion of Eld. J. S. White, it was Voted: That the phrase "And Second Advent Messenger" be added to the title of the World's Crisis.

While the ballot was being counted, a proposition was made to suspend the action requiring a two-thirds vote to elect an Editor, and that the present ballot be decided by the majority rule; but not meeting with general approval, at the suggestion of the Chair, it was dropped till after the ballot was reported, which was as follows:—Whole No. votes cast for Editor 45; necessary for a choice, 30; Berick 26, Grant 18, Hastings 1,—no choice. For Assistant Editor, whole No. 43; necessary for a choice, 29; D. T. Taylor 20, Grant 20, Hastings 1, Berick 2,—no choice; whereupon, the action requiring a two-thirds vote was suspended. At this point, a little confusion of understanding arose as to whether the majority rule just adopted was to be applied to the last ballot or to a new one. It appearing evident that it was not generally understood as applying to the former, on motion, a new ballot for Editor was proceeded to, which was reported as follows:—Whole No. votes cast, 47; necessary for a choice, 24; Grant 23, Berick 22, Hastings 2,—no choice. On motion, still another ballot was taken, reported as follows:—Whole No. votes 46; necessary for a choice, 24; M. Grant 24, Berick 22. ... Grant declared elected Editor. ... as Associate in the Editorial Chair, the Association proceeded to vote for the same. Result as follows:—Whole No. votes 39, necessary for a choice, 20; Hastings 1, Taylor 1, Wendell 1, J. S. White 12, Morgan 24; P. B. Morgan declared elected Associate Editor.

W. Pratt resigned his post on Publishing Committee; his resignation accepted. Voted: That the change in the title of the Crisis go into effect when the new Editors assume their office, Nov. 1st, 1861.

The Report of Committee on Editorial Regulations was then taken up, and articles I, II, III, were adopted. Article IV was read and discussed. Remarks were made by Brn. White, Brown, Hastings, Ross, Wellcome, and others. Adjourned to meet at 1 P. M.

1 P. M. The Chair opened meeting by prayer. Discussion resumed upon Article IV of Editorial regulations, each speaker limited to one speech and two minutes time, after which the article was adopted, as were also Articles V. and VI. The Association then proceeded to elect the officers for the A. C. A. and the C. P. S. for the ensuing year. Brn. Hastings, Curry, and Wellcome, were appointed a Committee of nomination for the former; and Brn. Grant, Brewer, and Ross, for the latter society. Brn. Hovey, Rodman, and E. G. Higgins, were appointed Committee on Ballots. Brn. Berick, H. Pratt, and J. Hemenway declined a nomination to office.

The following list of Officers were nominated for the A. C. A. and afterward by ballot elected:—D. T. Taylor, President; P. B. Morgan, Vice President; H. F. Carpenter, Secretary; Geo. T. Adams, Treasurer; S. G. Mathewson, B. R. York, A. Ross, R. E. Ladd, M. Grant, H. L. Hastings, Rufus Wendell, C. Goodrich, M. Batchelder, Directors.

The following list were nominated for the C. P. S. and afterward by ballot elected:—H. L. Hastings, President; J. D. Brown, Secretary; Geo. T. Adams, Treasurer; H. V. Davis, S. S. Brewer, I. C. Wellcome, J. G. Hamblin, S. Hovey, Publishing Committee; H. L. Hastings, H. F. Carpenter, D. T. Taylor, Editorial Committee.

Voted:—That the names of those writing articles for the Crisis, whose letters are received, be published in its columns weekly.

The thanks of the Association were presented to the Brethren and Sisters in Worcester for their kindness and hospitality in entertaining its members.

The thanks of the Association were also voted to the President and Secretary for their services. Whereupon the Association adjourned sine die.

H. F. CARPENTER, Secretary.

EXPLANATION.—The actual cash balance belonging to the Christian Publication Society at the time of the Worcester meeting was $412,49. As $159,53 of the amount was in my hands as Business Agent, Bro. Adams could only report $252,96 as being in the Treasury. RUFUS WENDELL.

RESOLUTION.—At a meeting of the C. P. Society on Oct. 22, 1861, the following Resolution was passed and ordered to be published in the Crisis:—

"Resolved, That the thanks of this Society are due to the retiring officers of the Society and to their business agent, for their earnest and successful endeavors to reduce the business of the office of publication to a more systematic condition, thus obviating the necessity for various complaints in that department, and leaving an example of order and correctness, which it is to be hoped that succeeding managers will be able fully to imitate.

H. L. HASTINGS, Pres. C. P. S.
JOSEPH D. BROWN, Sec. C. P. S.

TRANSPOSITION.—On the last page, in the article on Dan. 12: 2, third paragraph, lines nine and ten are transposed. It should read, "The arguments that prove the resurrection of one class, in many cases, prove the resurrection of both."

For the Crisis.

BRO. LADD'S OFFER.—A sister in Iowa, wishing to accept Bro. Ladd's recent proposition, writes me to know the price of the work, "Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again," and where it can be obtained For her information, and that of others, I will state—1. The offer is, to send "Retribution" without charge to any who, believing in the revival of the wicked dead, will buy and read "Life from the Dead." 2. The price of the latter work is 20 cents, sent postage free. It may be ordered of me by any who send for it on the ground of Bro. Ladd's proposal, and I will forward with the work a copy of "Retribution." A Roxbury brother last evening called at the Crisis office and bought copies of each of the above works, saying he was interested in the subject, and wished to examine both sides. May the Lord guide all sincere inquirers into the truth. RUFUS WENDELL.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in New Lebanon, Sept. 27th, 1861, Bro. ROBERT GAVIN, aged 67.

He went to bed as well as usual Thursday night, the 26th, and was found dead the next morning in his bed, having the appearance of dying without a struggle. In his death we are called to mourn the loss of a father in Israel, but we mourn not as those who have no hope, for we believe he had a good hope in Christ, and that he will have part in the first resurrection, on which the second death will have no power. We have known him for thirteen years, and never shall we forget the many comforting words he has given us when we have been in affliction, and the many blessed seasons we have had together at a throne of grace. He was a devoted Methodist until he heard the subject presented upon the nearness of the judgment by Brothers Grant and Pratt, in 1853. He partly believed it, and rejoiced to think that it might be so, and from that time up to his death seemed to rejoice in the fact that deliverance was near. I think he never was fully satisfied upon the sleep of the dead until he went to the Wilbraham Campmeeting this fall; then he became satisfied that we have no immortality until we put it on at the coming of Christ. He has told me since the meeting that the subject was presented in such a clear manner that he could not help but believe it, and, that it was the best meeting he ever attended in his life. But he is done meeting with the children of God in this vale of tears, yet we hope to meet again in a little while, on the fair banks of deliverance, where the inhabitants shall no more say they are sick, and where death itself shall be destroyed.

Now I ask, in behalf of his children, and especially Bro. and Sr. Morin, the prayers of God's children, that they may have grace equal to their day, and be enabled to overcome the world, and reign with Christ in his kingdom forever. May we all improve by these lessons and to the glory of God, is my prayer Amen. N. McCULLOCK, Jr.

Died, Aug. 2d, of dipththeria, SYDNEY, son of Jasper H. and Drusilla W. Harding, aged 7 years and 5 months.

Diphtheria, in its most dreadful form,
To our quiet home has come,
Taken one of our lovely gems,
And we are left to mourn.
Yes, our darling Sydney's gone,
We've laid him in the ground,
No more his voice we'll hear
Till the last trump shall sound.
The last words that on earth he spake,
When struggling hard in death,
Were, "Oh, my mother dear,
I cannot catch my breath."
One little precious lock of hair
Is all that is left to us
Of Sydney, our fond cherished boy,
Who slumbers in the dust.
The things he used to call his own
How dear to us they are;
His place around the board is void,
For Sydney is not there.
But we mourn not without a hope
Of seeing our boy again,
For, at the Master's blessed return,
We'll see him free from pain.
O that he would hasten the time
To return to earth again,
To raise the dead up from their graves,
And the righteous living change.
Then we'll meet again, we trust,
And meet no more to part;
The thought is a cheering thought to us,
It is a balm to our wounded hearts.
Sickness can not enter there,
Nor there can cruel death,
And Sydney in that blessed land
Will never want for breath.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1. The following letter from Gen. Scott was received by the President on Thursday afternoon:

"HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, Oct. 31, 1861.

The Hon. S. Cameron, Secretary of War.

Sir: For more than three years I have been unable, from a hurt, to mount a horse, or to walk more than a few paces at a time, and that with much pain. Other and new infirmities, dropsy and vertigo, admonish me that repose of mind and body, with the appliances of surgery and medicine, are necessary to add a little more to a life already protracted much beyond the usual span of man. It is under such circumstances, made doubly painful by the unnatural and unjust rebellion now raging in the Southern States of our so lately prosperous and happy Union, that I am compelled to request that my name be placed on the list of army officers retired from active service. As this request is founded on an absolute right granted by a recent act of Congress, I am entirely at liberty to say that it is with deep regret that I withdraw myself in these momentous times from the orders of a President who has treated me with much distinguished kindness and courtesy, whom I know, upon much personal intercourse, to be patriotic without sectional prejudices; to be highly conscientious in the performance of every duty, and unrivalled in activity and perseverance; and to you, Mr. Secretary, whom I now officially address for the last time, I beg to acknowledge my many obligations for the uniform high consideration I have received at your hands, and have the honor to remain,

Sir, with the highest respect,
Your obedient servant,
WINFIELD SCOTT."

A special Cabinet Council was convened this morning at 9 o'clock, to take the subject into consideration. It was decided that Gen. Scott's request, under the circumstances of his advanced age and infirmities, could not be declined. Gen. McClellan was, therefore, with the unanimous agreement of the Cabinet, notified that the command of the army would be devolved upon him

A Call for Funds.

The publishing committee of the CHRISTIAN PUBLICATION SOCIETY, deeply sensible of the fact that the time is short, and that our work must be done soon, or not at all, venture this appeal to those interested in disseminating divine truth through the press.

We purpose to commence at ONCE the publication of Tracts upon important Scriptural topics, of vital interest to the church of God in these times of peril and dismay. We wish to present to the household of faith "meat in due season." We wish to scatter light among the benighted of the earth, and so sound out the word of the Lord.

To do this on a scale answering at all to immediate necessities, we propose to raise at once FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, ($500) by special contributions, for this object. This money is designed to obtain and publish tracts, new and old, adapted to the times in which we live. We who engage in the work as publishing committee have no salaries or pay whatever for our services, and we mean that every dollar contributed shall tell in the great work. Each tract will be submitted to the careful examination and judgment of our Editorial Committee, H. L. Hastings, H. F. Carpenter and D. T. Taylor, in whose judgment, ability and prudence the churches can safely confide. Only such tracts as they shall approve will be published by the Society. We expect to furnish tracts cheaper than ANY TRACT SOCIETY in the COUNTRY, and our surplus, beyond the actual expenses of issuing them, will be devoted to the purpose of furnishing tracts for gratuitous circulation, or wherever they may be needed.

Brethren, will you help us in this work? Will you give us money? Or will you send us $100, $50, $20, or $10, to be repaid in TRACTS, at cheap rates, when you shall choose to order them? We wish this work to move on at once. We therefore call for $500, and pledge ourselves to see it used in a manner that shall tend to accomplish the desired object. We do not wish to divert the funds of the World's Crisis for this work, nor has its treasury sufficient money that can be spared for this purpose. We call upon all interested in publishing and scattering cheap Tracts, to contribute for this object. Will not preachers take hold of it? Will not churches make collections and remit them?

No fear need be entertained that the work will be delayed. As soon as a portion of it is raised, and tracts are prepared, it can begin, and each dollar added will facilitate the object and extend the operations of the society. Come, then, to the work. Send us donations, pledges, or loans, to be repaid in publications, in amounts from a hundred dollars to a widow's mite; and with them let your prayers ascend, that God's blessing may attend our efforts and crown them with success. Monies should be sent to Miles Grant, Editor of the World's Crisis, Boston, Mass.

☞ PREMIUM TRACT!! ☜

THE CHRISTIAN PUBLICATION SOCIETY offer a premium of TEN DOLLARS for the best TRACT on THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and the tokens of the near approach of the Kingdom of God.

The Tract should be plainly written, on only one side of the paper, (covering about 24 pages foolscap, in ordinary hand-writing,) and the manuscripts should be accompanied by a sealed envelope containing the author's name. If more than one manuscript is retained, satisfactory payment will be made for the same. Rejected MSS. are to be at their author's disposal, and the committee may reject all if thought best by them.

Manuscripts should be sent to the Crisis office, addressed to the "EDITORIAL COMMITTEE OF THE WORLD'S CRISIS, BOSTON, MASS., or to H. L. Hastings, D. T. Taylor, or H. F. Carpenter, Editorial Committee, on or before January 1st, 1862.

For the Crisis.

God is True.

False and fleeting as a shadow
Earthly scenes, with every joy,
Transient as the morning's dew-drop,
Fading as the leaves of autumn,
But 'mid all, like rainbow hue,
Gleams the token—God is true!

Friends round whom our hearts are clinging
As the tendrils to the vine,
Whom we trust sincerely, fully,
Deeming them our friends most truly,
May 'mid scenes of woe decline:
But whatever they may do,
Our best Friend is always true.

Hopes may wither, joys be scattered,
Earth's fair visions, one by one,
With our heart's most cherished treasures,
Fade as do the lovely blossoms
'Neath the scorching noonday's sun:
Yes, let all recede from view,
GOD REMAINS FOREVER TRUE!

For the Crisis.

Daniel 12: 2.

A request having been made for Prof. Geo. Bush's version of this passage, as it is always better to have the facts as they are than as they are not, I proceed to offer a copy of his translation.

But first let me remark that Prof. Bush was not merely a translator, but also an expositor, or possibly in some cases an unintentional perverter of Scripture. He wrote a labored volume, the object of which was to prove that the Resurrection takes place at death, according to the faith of the Swedenborgian church, in which, during his later years, he was a teacher. His work is entitled "ANASTASIS;" which is the Greek word for "resurrection." In his preface he says: "The resurrection of the body, if my reasonings and expositions are well-founded, is not a doctrine of revelation." This being his faith, and he, with Swedenborg, rejecting to a great degree the literal interpretation of the Scripture, and adopting the spiritual or mystical style, which consists mainly, not in believing what the Scriptures say, but in making them say what we believe, by interpretations and mystifications, his obvious course was, evidently, to interpret, paraphrase, apply, and explain away, every passage that taught the idea of a resurrection of the dead from their graves, so that those Scriptures would not contradict his theory or his plan. He knew if these passages were to be accepted as literal statements of FACTS his theory must fall. Hence these passages must be so interpreted as not to teach a resurrection of the dead from their graves.

From this we see that his arguments, designed to prove that none of the dead would be raised from the graves, or perhaps like some ancient teachers, that, in great part, "the resurrection is past already," are likely to be very serviceable to those who deny that any of the wicked dead will rise. The arguments that prove prove the resurrection of both; and so if the resurrection of one class in many cases Prof. Bush's whole argument disproves the resurrection of both, part of his argument may perhaps be useful in disproving the resurrection of a part. Nevertheless Prof. Bush was no doubt an honest man, and an excellent Hebrew scholar,—so if he says a passage must be translated so and so, his authority is very good, but if he paraphrases it, his paraphrase simply tells what he thinks the passage means, and is true or false, as his theory argues or disagrees with God's word. To illustrate. If I were to paraphrase Daniel 12: 2, I should do it somewhat as follows: "And the multitudes that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some (of them, the righteous, shall awake) to everlasting life, and some (of them, the unrighteous) shall awake to shame and eternal abhorrence." Now this is just about what I think is the sense of the text. I think the words enclosed in parenthesis give the idea, only with greater fulness; but it would be wrong for any one reading the above to say that that was my translation of it, for it is not, and any Hebrew scholar knows that certain words in it are not found in the Hebrew at all.

Among the Jews, according to Josephus, the Pharisees believed that only the righteous would "have power to revive and live again"; but that the ghosts of the ungodly went down into Gehenna and never were brought forth. Of course they would use just such arguments to prove that the wicked dead do not rise, as other men now, who do not heed Christ's injunction to beware of their doctrine, might make use of. The Sadducees believed none would rise,—the Pharisees believed that only the righteous would rise. Jesus taught a resurrection of "all that were in the graves"; and Paul, "a resurrection of the dead"—which the Jews, the common people, also expected, "just and unjust." So while the doctrine of Pharisees and Sadducees were both wrong, the truth was according to the statements of Jesus and Paul.

But the Pharisaic idea, that the wicked could have no resurrection from the grave, was held by the Pharisaic descendants of those Jews who had rejected the counsel of God, crucified the Lord of glory, made void the law by their traditions, and filled their minds with an endless variety of monstrous Jewish fables and puerile conceits, that are now beneath the notice of any [illegible] a resurrection from the dead. Many held that only Jews would rise—that all Jews would rise in Palestine—that if buried elsewhere they would be rolled under ground till they got there, so as to come up with the rest;—hence they desired burial in the sacred soil. I have met with abundance of these fooleries while investigating the question of Paradise, in preparing my (yet unfinished) book, "The Perfect State, or, forever with the Lord."

As these persons some of them denied the resurrection of any but Israelites, and believed that no Israelite would be lost, of course they would have to explain away such passages as this, almost as much as Prof. Bush would, only they believed in the bodily resurrection of part, while he did of none. So the learned Aben Ben Ezra, and the famous Sadias Gaon, interpret this passage some as Prof. Bush has done since, as teaching a partial resurrection, i. e., of the righteous only.

With these remarks I proceed to give Prof. Bush's PARAPHRASE or interpretation, which some seem to think was wanted when an enquiry was made for his translation. The two are widely different. Here is the paraphrase:—

"As the result of the whole, then, we give the following as the correct EXPLICATION of the passage, which will at once afford an answer to the objection, that the same thing—viz., awaking—is predicated of both classes: 'And many of the sleepers of the dust shall awake; these (the awakened) (shall be) to everlasting life; and those (the unawakened) (shall be) to shame and everlasting contempt.'"

This is his "explication" of the passage, i. e., it is what it should say to teach his doctrine or something like it, for he, while suggesting that it may refer partly to such persons as were raised during Christ's ministry and after his resurrection, intimates that he sees "not how to resist the conclusion, that the awaking from the dead announced by Daniel, points mainly to a spiritual and not a corporeal resurrection." But he does not for a moment pretend that the passage says what in his "explication" he represents it to mean. In his Anastasis he does translate the passage, and, as a critical Hebrew scholar, his translation is of value. He says, "The following may serve as a literal version:—

"AND MANY OF THE SLEEPERS OF THE DUST OF THE GROUND SHALL AWAKE—THESE TO EVERLASTING LIFE AND THOSE TO SHAME AND EVERLASTING CONTEMPT." p. 131, etc.

So fails the support of this learned man, when he comes simply as a scholar to translate the passage. It needs his "explication," in which are twenty-one of God's words, (if he translates rightly,) and eight of his own, to sustain this idea. Winnow the chaff out, and you have the wheat—the truth.

Probably Prof. Moses Stuart has been considered one of the ablest, if not the ablest oriental philologist in New England, if not in America. In his commentary on Daniel, he applies the whole of Daniel 11 to events long since past, making the kings there described to be those of Persia and Egypt and Syria, etc. He had every motive to lead him to show that the resurrection here was figurative, as it is intimately connected, as he admits, with chapter 11, which he argued, quite erroneously, I think, was all fulfilled about the time of Antiochus the Great.

Nevertheless, the force of the language did not permit him so to do, and in his commentary on Daniel, pp. 360–365, he has the following translation and criticism:—

"And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.

As to RAVEEM (many) I cannot regard it as designed to contrast with few, i. e., some, or a few, who do not rise, but as an expression equivalent to our word multitudes. . . . There is no intimation in the context of a party not to be raised up. RAVEEM cannot mean the good only, for all of them are to be restored to life in the way of reward, and in order to be made happy; nor can it mean the evil only, for they are raised up to suffer the retribution due to them, shame and everlasting contempt, which plainly is not affirmed of all. In Rom. 5: 15, 17, HOI POLLOI (many) is used by Paul in like manner, i. e., as equivalent to multitudes, the mass.

* * * These verses (2, 3) open the prospect of the future and final destiny of men, both the righteous and the wicked, and show us the final result of the Messianic period.

As to the question whether RAVEEM should be referred only to the pious Jews, there is no need of a moment's delay. No such Jews surely will be raised up to everlasting contempt. I do not see any good reason why RAVEEM should be limited merely to Hebrews, excepting that the martyrs of the preceding chapter belong to that nation. . . . And inasmuch as a general resurrection is here taught, it can be no other than that which will take place at the end of the gospel dispensation." pp. 360, 364.

I had not Prof. Stuart's Commentary in my library when I prepared Retribution, but I nevertheless find that my view is substantially the same with his, as the following extract from that work, pp. 138, 143, will show:—

"The prophecy of Daniel, 'And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt;' is not, it is said, correctly translated. Many is not all. The phrases rendered 'some to everlasting life, and some to shame,' should be 'these to life,' and 'those to shame.' So Prof. [illegible] renders: 'And many from [illegible]

Bush renders the expression 'these,' and 'those,' and says, 'The awaking is evidently predicated of the many and not of the whole; consequently, the 'these' in the one case must be understood of the class that awakes, and the 'those' in the other, of that day which remains asleep.' Hence it is claimed, if such are the facts, no argument for a resurrection of the wicked to shame and everlasting contempt can be brought from this passage.

It is true that learned men have said all this, and it is quite possible also, that Hymeneus and Philetus said so too, when, with cankerous words they sought to overthrow the faith of some, and prove that the resurrection was past already. Prof. Bush, though an estimable and learned man, became a Swedenborgian, denied the resurrection of the body, tried to show that the apostles were mistaken when they preached it, tried to prove from this passage that the wicked have no resurrection, and finally did not believe that the righteous have any either! A hopeful leader. When it is proved the wicked will not rise, the work is more than half done, and the same ingenuity, persevering, will disprove the resurrection of anybody else. We must watch these translations very closely.

As to Prof. WHITING's translation I do not specially object to it, but his comments which apply the 'these' to the awakened, and 'those' to the unawakened, and which have been used to prove that the wicked would not rise, I do not think so much of, as I did before I examined them. The same Hebrew expression is found in Joshua 8: 22, 'so they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side, and some on that side.' 1 Kings 20: 29. 'And they pitched one over against the other.' 1 Chron. 24: 5 'Thus were they divided by lot, one sort with another.' These instances I think are sufficient to vindicate our translation from any charge of serious incorrectness. And besides the comment which refers those to 'the unawakened' seems to be entirely gratuitous, and directly opposite to the teaching of the passage which says expressly that many SHALL awake, and divides the awakened into two classes by the words these and those, or 'some;' and says nothing whatever of any class who remain unawakened.

It is however objected that the expression 'many' is restrictive, many cannot be all. But Daniel did not write the word 'many,' he wrote the word RAVEEM.' Now the word 'RAV' signifies many, or multitude. Psalms 97: 1, 'Let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof.' 2 Chron. 20: 2. 'There cometh a great multitude against thee.'' The word in Daniel 12. 2, is 'RAVEEM,' the plural form of 'RAV,' so it should be rendered, not multitude, but MULTITUDES. Hence THOMAS WINTLE, in his excellent version of Daniel, renders the passage: 'Then MULTITUDES that sleep in the dust of the ground shall awake;' and he remarks upon it, 'this is a just and exact translation of the Hebrew.'

The ASSEMBLIE'S ANNOTATIONS upon this passage say: 'The time shall come, even that time of the general resurrection of all men, when these, (the persecuted ones,) shall awake out of the sleep of death, to everlasting life; and their persecuting enemies, notwithstanding this flourishing and triumphing estate in the short time of this life, shall then awake to shame and everlasting contempt.' See Heb. 11: 35; 2 Mac. 14: 46. Many: all the dead shall arise again: many sometimes signifieth all; as Rom. 5: 19. Here many doth distribute them all into two sorts, two multitudes, two ranks, as our Savior doth, Matt. 25. 33, &c. The Hebrew accent set upon the word 'RAVEEM' many so singles it out, as shows it is equally to be referred to both members of the distribution following.' John 5. 28, 29. The learned CALMET says, 'Nothing is more express than that these words prove the resurrection of the dead. This is the simple, literal, and natural sense of the place,' &c.

THOMAS WINTLE remarks. 'It has long been observed, that the word RAVEEM, 'multitudes,' ought to be understood as equivalent to 'all.' So Rom. 5: 15, 19; John 5. 28, 'all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth,' &c. And Mr. PETERS in his Dissertation on Job has justly observed, the 'the all of our Savior is in the judgment of the learned, a good interpretation of the prophet's many, and must have been esteemed so by those who heard Him speak the one passage, and were well acquainted with the other, its parallel.'

But leaving the passage and allowing the word 'RAVEEM' to be correctly rendered many, let us inquire if the term many does not, in Scripture language, sometimes signify all. The Septuagint version has for this term the Greek word 'POLLOI.' Now by turning to Romans 5: 17, 18, we read, 'For if through the offence of one, 'HOI POLLOI,' the many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, hath abounded unto 'tous pollous,' the many.' How many are here included? How many were condemned through the offence of one? 'By the offence of one judgment came upon ALL MEN to condemnation.' How many receive the abounding grace? 'By the righteousness of one the free gift came upon ALL MEN, to justification of life.' Not to salvation, in the kingdom of God, but to justification of life, or release from Adamic death, in the resurrection of all mankind.

Again: 'For as by one man's disobedience 'HOI POLLOI,' the many were made sinners, so by the righteousness of one shall the many, 'HOI POLLOI,' be made righteous.' Rom. 5: 19. How many were made sinners 'by the disobedience of one?' 'So death passed upon all men, for that ALL have sinned.' Rom. 5: 12.

Here we may observe that the expression 'THE MANY,' is equivalent to 'all,' and farther, that the effects of Christ's righteousness are as wide as those of Adam's sin. As many as suffered death by the sin of the one, shall be raised to life by the obedience of the other. Or in other words, 'As in Adam ALL die, even so in Christ shall ALL be made alive.'

Again: it is written, 'The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' Mark 10: 45. How 'many' is the ransom for? Let Paul reply: 'There is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a RANSOM FOR ALL, to be testified in due time.' 1 Tim. 2: 5, 6. [illegible]

Let the true and faithful witness answer. 'ALL that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of condemnation.' John 5: 28, 29. And upon this basis of solemn prophetic assertion, there was ample room to rest that hope of which Paul makes mention when he says: 'After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the PROPHETS: and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, OR EXPECT that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the JUST and UNJUST.' Acts 24: 14, 15."

I find that what was intended only as a brief paragraph, has come to be a lengthy article. The importance of the subject, and the desire to present the facts needful for the understanding of the passage, must be my excuse for this prolixity. I trust it will need no further reference on my part. May God guide us unto all truth, and give us our portion with Daniel and all the faithful in the Resurrection of the just.

The Banner of Righteousness.

AIR.—"Star Spangled Banner."

Oh, can you not see, by the gospel's pure light,
As it shines in its splendor, the lonely heart cheering,
The signs that foretell the approach of that night—
The night full of sorrow, and sighing, and fearing?
Soon the night will be gone, and the morning appear,
And it fills us with joy, for our heart is not here.
Oh, when will the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved?

See the signs in the air, on the earth, in the sea—
The blushing Aurora, a world's mighty wonder;
Distress of the nations and perplexity—
The sea and waves roaring with voices of thunder!
Sure, we cannot mistake, if we but keep awake,
The signs which the Lord has hung out for our sake.
Oh, soon will the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved.

Then lift up your heads; let the mourning now cease,
Who is this now approaching in glory and grandeur?
'Tis creation's great King, 'tis the fair Prince of peace,
Marching on to his throne from his bed in a manger!
Now the angels of light are his retinue bright,
And the heart is enraptured with seeing the sight.
Oh, then, let the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved.

In Immanuel's land we will always abide,
For our life will be long, and our days never-ending;
No war's dread alarms, nor death's surging tide,
Can reach that fair band, all in harmony blending.
Then we'll watch for the day, till the night wears away,
And the day-star appears with its beautiful ray.
Oh, then will the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved.

Controversy.

Many of the controversies in this world are the result of mere misunderstandings. Men use terms undefined; they assert and deny—deny and assert—and often the argument passes from the original question to a dispute as to the meaning of the men who are disputing. Says one writer:—

"Disputants often become metaphysical, according to the explanation given of metaphysics by the Scotchman who said, 'Why, ye see, metaphysics is when two men are talking thegither, and ane of them dinna ken what he is talking about, and the ither canna understand him.' Drs. Chalmers and Stuart must have been a 'wee bit' metaphysical the day they got into a controversy about the nature of faith. Chalmers, compelled at length to leave his friend, said, 'I have time to say no more; but you will find my views fully and well put up in a recent tract, called "Difficulties in the way of believing."' 'Why,' exclaimed the astonished Dr. Stuart, 'that is my own tract; I published it myself!' That man was surely wise who prefaced every debate with 'Gentleman, define your terms.'"

It would not be strange when such men as Chalmers and Stuart were so befogged with words, that others of less ability should also fight "as one that beateth the air." It is hardly possible for two men, when in heated discussion, to apprehend each other's minor differences of thought with precision. They look on one side only, and they do not easily see the strength of the positions on the other. Let two men go from an earnest dispute and write down their opponent's arguments, and ten chances to one each will misrepresent the other. Then, of course, if their reports were published, each would feel insulted and grieved and misrepresented. Each, of course, must correct the other, reply to his arguments, and dispute his assertions; and if they get through the whole without giving each other the lie direct, they may be set down as probably in a somewhat hopeful and gracious state.

Hence the wisdom of undertaking to tell what we think ourselves, and not undertaking to interpret, represent, or misrepresent the faith of others. Few can do it and escape the charge of inaccuracy or unfairness. God's means of preserving truth in the world is not controversy, but testimony. We speak the things we do know, and testify that we have seen. 'Let us bear our witness, exalt the truth, and let it stand, ... [illegible]

Sabbath Schools.

BRO. GRANT:—This enterprise is one which commends itself to every christian. The training of the young is a duty which was made imperative by the Jewish laws. "Thou shalt diligently teach them to thy children, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up, and when thou walkest by the way," etc. One may infer from this that whenever they were in company with children, they were required to instruct them in the statutes and judgments of Jehovah, and this early training is undoubtedly one prominent reason why the Jews have maintained their identity so long.

We have also a command equally binding from our Saviour. "Feed my lambs," said he to Peter, and in the days of his flesh he took them in his arms and blessed them, and if we would be his followers and obey his commands, we must do likewise. That the Adventists have been remiss in Sabbath School instruction is apparent. There are many causes that have operated to bring about this state of things. 1. The preaching of the time of the Lord's coming called the attention of multitudes from this, and every thing else but the one idea of the Lord's speedy coming. 2. There has in many places been so much discord among brethren, that it was impossible for them to work in harmony in any branch of christian duty. Different views of Scripture doctrine have caused more trouble in the Advent church than all the opposition from outward opposers.

I think we might take a lesson of wisdom in this respect from the American Sunday School Union, which is composed of five different denominations, yet the most perfect harmony has characterized their movements from the commencement of this organization, and great have been the results of their labor. To their missionaries many churches in the west and other parts of the country owe their existence. But to return to ourselves. Should we not make a wise improvement of past experience, and gird on the armor anew in behalf of the little ones, and now, while there is a good prospect of success, put in the sickle and gather the harvest, before the coming storm sweeps over us and they are left out of the fold to perish.

We cannot close our eyes to the sure word of prophecy which says that in the last days perilous times shall come, and the greater the peril, the more caution is necessary. There will, in my opinion, be another time preached among us before the Lord comes, and shall we not be so thoroughly organized and "occupying," that when it is the true time, the Lord will say to us "well done"? And what more commendable duty could we be found engaged in, than feeding the lambs of the flock?

Much more might be said upon this subject, but, as I believe in short communications, as well as short prayers, I will give place for others. I will, however, simply suggest that, as we have no Sabbath School paper of a denominational character, one column of the Crisis be devoted especially to this cause, until there is a children's paper published among us.

Letter from Dr. Willard.

DEAR BRO. WENDELL:—Enclosed I send you a gold dollar for your excellent paper. Please direct to J. G. This brother has become recently interested in the life and death view of Bible doctrine, and not only him, but several of his neighbors are fully persuaded that there is no eternal life out of Christ. We were invited to that neighborhood last spring to address the people in our humble way, expecting violent opposition to our "peculiar views," as they are termed; but taking special care to back up by Scripture references our position; none could gainsay or call us in question, and the honest ones began to give credence to the truth, as the Spirit seemed to sanction the word spoken, although in great weakness. Added to our poor labors, we disseminated among them sundry tracts, which, under God, have been made a blessing to several adults, and we doubt not will, in the end, prove a great blessing among the Sunday school children with whom we meet. An increasing interest is quite obvious, and we feel greatly encouraged to labor on, knowing that God will honor his word and verify his promise that it "shall not return void, but accomplish that whereunto it is sent." God is able, through the weakest instrumentalities, to bring light out of darkness, and by making the truth appear in contrast with the many fabulous creeds so generally believed, glorify his name thereby.

But the true church of Christ will, in all probability, have to undergo trial, and it may be tribulations, for the enemy is rampant among us already, and, if we apprehend the prophetic word, persecutions even unto death may await the faithful and persevering, and when "the great day of his wrath is come, who shall be able to stand?" May the good Lord guide us unto his coming and kingdom, is my prayer.

Yours in christian bonds,
R. WILLARD.

Religion and Business.

"They are saying, sir, that you are neglecting your business, and that it must suffer."

"Who says it?" says the employer.

"All your neighbors along the street, sir."

Do any christians say it?"

"Well, I hardly know whether they are christians or not; I suppose not. But I thought I ought to let you know what was said. Besides there is a good deal of money to be paid, and I do not know where it is coming from."

"How much are you short?"

"About six hundred to-day, and other bills mature to-morrow and next day, and I felt anxious to know how they are to be met."

"Do you believe our Savior meant any thing when he said, 'Seek first the kingdom of heaven.'"

"Certainly I do."

"Well, what do suppose he meant?"

"Oh, I do not know. I have never thought of it. Perhaps I should not be able to answer it if I should try. But I do not think that business is to be neglected."

"I am very much astonished to hear you, a professor of religion, talk in this way. As for me, I believe he means just what he says, and I mean to do literally what he requires. I do not neglect my business. I know what paper is maturing, and I do not give myself the least uneasiness about it. I used all proper diligence and the rest I leave to God."

When speaking of it, the merchant said, "I knew where I could lay my hand on the money at once, though I did not tell my clerk of it. I went to the noon-day prayer-meeting as usual. On coming home after one P. M., I asked my clerk about the means to meet my bills for to-day."

"Oh, said he, "we are all right. Mr. B— has been in, and has paid $1,800 and some other money has come in."

"This $1,800 was a bad debt, which I never expected to be paid," said the merchant. So the Lord takes care of me, while I take care of the affairs of my own soul and the souls of others, and seek first the kingdom of heaven."

This man is one of the new recruits into the great army. His hand, his heart, his mind, are ready for every good work, every good word, and no duty is left undone.

Said a salesman in one of our heavy wholesale houses to a young and honest disciple of Christ:

"You ought not to have said what you did to that buyer. I sold him the goods at a good price, for cash—remember, cash—and now he will not take them."

"He asked me about the goods, and I told him the truth, that they were damaged. I cannot tell a lie for all the goods there are in the store; and I will not," said the young clerk.

"I am sorry,—I am very sorry," said the salesman, "to say that I must report you to the firm. But I feel it my duty to do it. I cannot be balked in this way, when I have done a good thing for the employers, to have it all upset by your squeamishness. I must go back to the counting-room, and report you."

"Very well," said the clerk, "I will go with you, and go now. I shall tell them honestly the whole transaction, and we will see what they have to say to your fleecing a customer in this way."

The salesman's courage failed, for within a few weeks the leading member of that firm had been converted, and he was a little afraid he might be disposed to "do his business on christian principles," so he did not risk the appeal, and report.

This clerk was but a mere boy of nineteen. We are happy to know that many a pious young man has made up his mind to do honor to his christian profession, and not compromise himself by following the "laws of trade."—Power of prayer.

All Earthly Investments Unsafe.

How many instances of this truth have come under the personal knoweldge of each one of us. Perhaps of those who with great patience and trouble accumulate wealth, the larger part lose it before they die, and little ever remains to the third generation. A single mistake may deprive a man of the fruits of half a century of prudence. We know a careful and successful man, who by perseverance and sagacity had got together three-fourths of a million of dollars. He had not long retired from trade, and reached threescore and ten, when in an unfortunate moment he entered into an engagement which swept away all his estate. His "riches made themselves wings and fled away." This is not a solitary case by any means. It is a thing of common occurrence. No wisdom or caution can secure against it. The most prudent men in the country are often ruined by mistakes of judgment, or by dishonesty of others, or unforeseen accidents. We were once in the counting-house of an old merchant, when a clergyman entered and asked for his advice as to the best investment of a small sum of money. The clergyman observed that his desire was to put his little treasure where it would be entirely safe. The merchant laughed aloud at the "greenness" of his clerical friend, and told him if such was his purpose he must seek investment beyond this world, for security had never been found in it. A very careful gentleman of our acquaintance, with whom saving and secure investment were the sole business of life, would have all his property in real estate, and particularly he preferred ground-rents. These he thought were the safest of all securities. Unexpectedly an unsatisfied judgment of long standing found against a tract of land which had now become part of a city, where this gentleman had purchased many rents. To satisfy this judgment cost him what to most men would be a large fortune.

But if attained riches do not bring happiness, the pursuit of them nourishes avarice, and avarice is always poor. Solomon says, "There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."—There is also positive poverty, growing out of excessive value of money and morbid dread of want, is the common consequence of covetousness. It is the "fiend's" arch mock of the soul whom he has deluded with the prospective joys of wealth. Riches are attended with care and trouble. This is the testimony of all who [illegible] ... sets of others. The rich know what all others want, and the life of him who has to preserve wealth is necessarily a life of suspicion, and contention, and anxiety. "In the revenues of the wicked is trouble," and all are wicked who make this world their portion. Riches are not a refuge from the ills of life, nor from the wrath of God. Their advantages cover but a few years of an eternal existence. It is supreme folly to make the pursuit of them the business of life. Many have experienced this who would have avoided the sad experience had they pondered the words of Solomon: "Riches profit not in the day of wrath. He that trusteth in his riches shall fall. Labor not to be rich. Cease from thine own wisdom. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings: they fly away as an eagle toward heaven."

Soldiers and War.

My young readers have often been delighted to witness the military parade. They are pleased with the sound of soul-stirring music, the glitter of bright guns and swords, and the tramp of the war-horse. They follow the company on its march through the streets, and hasten to the muster-field to see the sham-fight. They wish they were old enough to train, that they might have a drum or a gun. They see nothing in all this show and parade that appears wrong, or that can do any harm. But think, reader, what are the soldiers learning? Are they not practising the art of war? And what is this but learning to kill men? What are the guns and swords for but to kill and murder others?

John is proud to follow the company in which his father and brother train. He wishes he were old enough to march with them. But suppose to-morrow that same company should be called out to go to the battle-field, where they must kill others, and probably be killed themselves. How would John feel as he heard the music, and saw them leave their happy homes, their children, their wives, their farms, and their dearest friends, never to see them again? Would he run after them, and shout, and wish he could be a soldier? If other soldiers from other countries should come and kill his mother, and murder his brothers and sisters, and burn his house and village, would he think it a fine thing to be a soldier? No; but this is their business. They march and exercise, and fire, that they may learn all this.

See an army marching to meet their enemy, with powder and balls, with cannon and swords, to kill and conquer. Would you like to be with them? Would you like to have your father or brother among them, and hear that they had died on the bloody field, and been trampled to the earth by the fierce war-horse? Think, before you choose and pursue any course, what it will lead to, and whether God will be pleased with it.—Stories for Children.

Never do Mischief.

A very fine looking boy, named Henry, lived near one of our large public schools. There were other boys living in the same house with Henry.

One night, two of the boys planned together to frighten Henry. So one of them hid himself under Henry's bed. About midnight a loud rap was heard at the door, and in stalked the other boy.

He was frightfully dressed in a white sheet, and had a lighted candle in his hand. Just as he came in the boy under the bed raised his back, and heaved up the bed in which Henry was lying.

Now mark what took place. Henry did not rise as early as usual that morning, and when some of the family went to call him, he would only answer by strange noises and cries. His reason was gone—he was deranged!

In the course of the first year after this, his reason seemed to come to him again. Thus what took place was partly made known. Some other things were found out by one of the boys.

But Henry's reason soon left him again, and he became a perfect idiot. True, he was not violent, and never engaged in tearing and throwing things about the room.

He was harmless and gentle, and continued so for many years. But in the night, at about the time when the boys frightened him, he would cry out with horror, "Oh, they are coming! they are coming!"—200 Stories for Children, by T. M. Preble.

The Brave Boy.

I was sitting by a window in the second story of one of the large boarding houses at Saratoga Springs, thinking of absent friends, when I heard shouts of children from the piazza beneath me.

"O, yes; that's capital! so we will! Come on now! There's William Hale! Come on, William; we're going to have a ride on the Circular Railway. Come with us!"

"Yes, if my mother is willing. I will run and ask her," replied William.

"O, O! so you must run and ask your ma! Great baby, run along to your ma! Ain't you ashamed? I didn't ask my mother." "Nor I," "nor I," added a half-dozen voices.

"Be a man, William," cried the first voice; "come along with us, if you don't want to be called a coward as long as you live. Don't you see we're all waiting?"

I leaned forward to catch a view of the children, and saw William standing with one foot advanced, and his hand firmly clenched, in the midst of the group. He was a fine subject for a painter at that moment. His flushed brow, flashing eye, compressed lip, and changing cheek, all told how that word coward was rankling in his breast. Will he prove himself indeed one, by yielding to them? thought I. It was with breathless interest I listened for an answer, for I feared that the evil principle in his heart would be stronger than the good. But no.

"I will not go without I ask my mother!" said the noble boy, his voice trembling with emotion, "and I am no coward either. I promised her I would not go from the house without permission, and I should be a base coward if I were to tell her a wicked lie." There was something commanding in his tone, which made the noisy children mute, [illegible]

God is True.

False and fleeting as a shadow
Earthly scenes, with every joy,
Transient as the morning's dew-drop,
Fading as the leaves of autumn,
But 'mid all, like rainbow hue,
Gleams the token—God is true!

Friends round whom our hearts are clinging
As the tendrils to the vine,
Whom we trust sincerely, fully,
Deeming them our friends most truly,
May 'mid scenes of wo decline:
But whatever they may do,
Our best Friend is always true.

Hopes may wither, joys be scattered,
Earth's fair visions, one by one,
With our heart's most cherished treasures,
Fade as do the lovely blossoms
'Neath the scorching noonday's sun:
Yes, let all recede from view,
God remains forever true!

Daniel 12: 2.

A request having been made for Prof. Geo. Bush's version of this passage, as it is always better to have the facts as they are than as they are not, I proceed to offer a copy of his translation.

But first let me remark that Prof. Bush was not merely a translator, but also an expositor, or possibly in some cases an unintentional perverter of Scripture. He wrote a labored volume, the object of which was to prove that the Resurrection takes place at death, according to the faith of the Swedenborgian church, in which, during his later years, he was a teacher. His work is entitled "Anastasis;" which is the Greek word for "resurrection." In his preface he says: "The resurrection of the body, if my reasonings and expositions are well-founded, is not a doctrine of revelation." This being his faith, and he, with Swedenborg, rejecting to a great degree the literal interpretation of the Scripture, and adopting the spiritual or mystical style, which consists mainly, not in believing what the Scriptures say, but in making them say what we believe, by interpretations and mystifications, his obvious course was, evidently, to interpret, paraphrase, apply, and explain away, every passage that taught the idea of a resurrection of the dead from their graves, so that those Scriptures would not contradict his theory or his plan. He knew if these passages were to be accepted as literal statements of facts his theory must fall. Hence those passages must be so interpreted as not to teach a resurrection of the dead from their graves.

From this we see that his arguments, designed to prove that none of the dead would be raised from the graves, or perhaps like some ancient teachers, that, in great part, "the resurrection is past already," are likely to be very serviceable to those who deny that any of the wicked dead will rise. The arguments that prove prove the resurrection of both; and so if the resurrection of one class in many cases Prof. Bush's whole argument disproves the resurrection of both, part of his argument may perhaps be useful in disproving the resurrection of a part. Nevertheless Prof. Bush was no doubt an honest man, and an excellent Hebrew scholar,—so if he says a passage must be translated so and so, his authority is very good, but if he paraphrases it, his paraphrase simply tells what he thinks the passage means, and is true or false, as his theory argues or disagrees with God's word. To illustrate. If I were to paraphrase Daniel 12: 2, I should do it somewhat as follows: "And the multitudes that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some (of them, the righteous, shall awake) to everlasting life, and some (of them, the unrighteous) shall awake to shame and eternal abhorrence." Now this is just about what I think is the sense of the text. I think the words enclosed in parenthesis give the idea, only with greater fulness; but it would be wrong for any one reading the above to say that that was my translation of it, for it is not, and any Hebrew scholar knows that certain words in it are not found in the Hebrew at all.

Among the Jews, according to Josephus, the Pharisees believed that only the righteous would "have power to revive and live again"; but that the ghosts of the ungodly went down into Gehenna and never were brought forth. Of course they would use just such arguments to prove that the wicked dead do not rise, as other men now, who do not heed Christ's injunction to beware of their doctrine, might make use of. The Sadducees believed none would rise,—the Pharisees believed that only the righteous would rise. Jesus taught a resurrection of "all that were in the graves"; and Paul, "a resurrection of the dead"—which the Jews, the common people, also expected, "just and unjust." So while the doctrine of Pharisees and Sadducees were both wrong, the truth was according to the statements of Jesus and Paul.

But the Pharisaic idea, that the wicked could have no resurrection from the grave, was held by the Pharisaic descendants of those Jews who had rejected the counsel of God, crucified the Lord of glory, made void the law by their traditions, and filled their minds with an endless variety of monstrous Jewish fables and puerile conceits, that are now beneath the notice of any [illegible] a resurrection from the dead. Many held that only Jews would rise—that all Jews would rise in Palestine—that if buried elsewhere they would be rolled under ground till they got there, so as to come up with the rest;—hence they desired burial in the sacred soil. I have met with abundance of these fooleries while investigating the question of Paradise, in preparing my (yet unfinished) book, "The Perfect State, or, forever with the Lord."

As these persons some of them denied the resurrection of any but Israelites, and believed that no Israelite would be lost, of course they would have to explain away such passages as this, almost as much as Prof. Bush would, only they believed in the bodily resurrection of part, while he did of none. So the learned Aben Ben Ezra, and the famous Sadias Gaon, interpret this passage some as Prof. Bush has done since, as teaching a partial resurrection, i. e., of the righteous only.

With these remarks I proceed to give Prof. Bush's paraphrase or interpretation, which some seem to think was wanted when an enquiry was made for his translation. The two are widely different. Here is the paraphrase:—

"As the result of the whole, then, we give the following as the correct explication of the passage, which will at once afford an answer to the objection, that the same thing—viz., awaking—is predicated of both classes: 'And many of the sleepers of the dust shall awake; these (the awakened) (shall be) to everlasting life; and those (the unawakened) (shall be) to shame and everlasting contempt.'"

This is his "explication" of the passage, i. e., it is what it should say to teach his doctrine or something like it, for he, while suggesting that it may refer partly to such persons as were raised during Christ's ministry and after his resurrection, intimates that he sees "not how to resist the conclusion, that the awaking from the dead announced by Daniel, points mainly to a spiritual and not a corporeal resurrection." But he does not for a moment pretend that the passage says what in his "explication" he represents it to mean. In his Anastasis he does translate the passage, and, as a critical Hebrew scholar, his translation is of value. He says, "The following may serve as a literal version:—

"And many of the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake—these to everlasting life and those to shame and everlasting contempt." p. 131, etc.

So fails the support of this learned man, when he comes simply as a scholar to translate the passage. It needs his "explication," in which are twenty-one of God's words, (if he translates rightly,) and eight of his own, to sustain this idea. Winnow the chaff out, and you have the wheat—the truth.

Probably Prof. Moses Stuart has been considered one of the ablest, if not the ablest oriental philologist in New England, if not in America. In his commentary on Daniel, he applies the whole of Daniel 11 to events long since past, making the kings there described to be those of Persia and Egypt and Syria, etc. He had every motive to lead him to show that the resurrection here was figurative, as it is intimately connected, as he admits, with chapter 11, which he argued, quite erroneously, I think, was all fulfilled about the time of Antiochus the Great.

Nevertheless, the force of the language did not permit him so to do, and in his commentary on Daniel, pp. 360–365, he has the following translation and criticism:—

"And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.

As to Ravrem (many) I cannot regard it as designed to contrast with few, i. e., some, or a few, who do not rise, but as an expression equivalent to our word multitudes. . . . There is no intimation in the context of a party not to be raised up. Ravrem cannot mean the good only, for all of them are to be restored to life in the way of reward, and in order to be made happy; nor can it mean the evil only, for they are raised up to suffer the retribution due to them, shame and everlasting contempt, which plainly is not affirmed of all. In Rom. 5: 15, 17, hoi polloi (many) is used by Paul in like manner, i. e., as equivalent to multitudes, the mass.

* * * These verses (2, 3) open the prospect of the future and final destiny of men, both the righteous and the wicked, and show us the final result of the Messianic period.

As to the question whether Ravrem should be referred only to the pious Jews, there is no need of a moment's delay. No such Jews surely will be raised up to everlasting contempt. I do not see any good reason why Ravrem should be limited merely to Hebrews, excepting that the martyrs of the preceding chapter belong to that nation. . . . And inasmuch as a general resurrection is here taught, it can be no other than that which will take place at the end of the gospel dispensation." pp. 360, 364.

I had not Prof. Stuart's Commentary in my library when I prepared Retribution, but I nevertheless find that my view is substantially the same with his, as the following extract from that work, pp. 138, 143, will show:—

"The prophecy of Daniel, 'And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt,' is not, it is said, correctly translated. Many is not all. The phrase rendered 'some to everlasting life, and some to shame,' should be 'these to life,' and 'those to shame.' So Prof. Whiting renders: 'And many from [illegible]

Bush renders the expression 'these,' and 'those,' and says, 'The awaking is evidently predicated of the many and not of the whole; consequently, the 'these' in the one case must be understood of the class that awakes, and the 'those' in the other, of that day which remains asleep.' Hence it is claimed, if such are the facts, no argument for a resurrection of the wicked to shame and everlasting contempt can be brought from this passage.

It is true that learned men have said all this, and it is quite possible also, that Hymeneus and Philetus said so too, when, with cankerous words they sought to overthrow the faith of some, and prove that the resurrection was past already. Prof. Bush, though an estimable and learned man, became a Swedenborgian, denied the resurrection of the body, tried to show that the apostles were mistaken when they preached it, tried to prove from this passage that the wicked have no resurrection, and finally did not believe that the righteous have any either! A hopeful leader. When it is proved the wicked will not rise, the work is more than half done, and the same ingenuity, persevering, will disprove the resurrection of anybody else. We must watch these translations very closely.

As to Prof. Whiting's translation I do not specially object to it, but his comments which apply the 'these' to the awakened, and 'those' to the unawakened, and which have been used to prove that the wicked would not rise, I do not think so much of, as I did before I examined them. The same Hebrew expression is found in Joshua 8: 22, 'so they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side, and some on that side.' 1 Kings 20: 29. 'And they pitched one over against the other.' 1 Chron. 24: 5. 'Thus were they divided by lot, one sort with another.' These instances I think are sufficient to vindicate our translation from any charge of serious incorrectness. And besides the comment which refers those to 'the unawakened' seems to be entirely gratuitous, and directly opposite to the teaching of the passage which says expressly that many shall awake, and divides the awakened into two classes by the words these and those, or 'some;' and says nothing whatever of any class who remain unawakened.

It is however objected that the expression 'many' is restrictive, many cannot be all. But Daniel did not write the word 'many,' he wrote the word ravrem.' Now the word 'rav' signifies many, or multitude. Psalms 97: 1, 'Let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof.' 2 Chron. 20: 2. 'There cometh a great multitude against thee.' The word in Daniel 12: 2, is 'ravrem,' the plural form of 'rav,' so it should be rendered, not multitude, but multitudes. Hence Thomas Wintle, in his excellent version of Daniel, renders the passage: 'Then multitudes that sleep in the dust of the ground shall awake;' and he remarks upon it, 'this is a just and exact translation of the Hebrew.'

The Assembly's Annotations upon this passage say: 'The time shall come, even that time of the general resurrection of all men, when these, (the persecuted ones,) shall awake out of the sleep of death, to everlasting life; and their persecuting enemies, notwithstanding this flourishing and triumphing estate in the short time of this life, shall then awake to shame and everlasting contempt.' See Heb. 11: 35, 2 Mac. 14: 46. Many: all the dead shall arise again: many sometimes signifieth all; as Rom. 5: 19. Here many doth distribute them all into two sorts, two multitudes, two ranks, as our Savior doth, Matt. 25: 33, &c. The Hebrew accent set upon the word 'ravrem' many so singles it out, as shows it is equally to be referred to both members of the distribution following.' John 5: 28, 29. The learned Calmet says, 'Nothing is more express than that these words prove the resurrection of the dead. This is the simple, literal, and natural sense of the place,' &c.

Thomas Wintle remarks: 'It has long been observed, that the word ravrem, 'multitudes,' ought to be understood as equivalent to 'all.' So Rom. 5: 15, 19; John 5: 28, 'all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth,' &c. And Mr. Peters in his Dissertation on Job has justly observed, that 'the all of our Savior is in the judgment of the learned, a good interpretation of the prophet's many, and must have been esteemed so by those who heard Him speak the one passage, and were well acquainted with the other, its parallel.'

But leaving the passage and allowing the word 'ravrem' to be correctly rendered many, let us inquire if the term many does not, in Scripture language, sometimes signify all. The Septuagint version has for this term the Greek word 'polloi.' Now by turning to Romans 5: 17, 18, we read, 'For if through the offence of one, 'hoi polloi,' the many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, hath abounded unto 'tous pollous,' the many.' How many are here included? How many were condemned through the offence of one? 'By the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation.' How many receive the abounding grace? 'By the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men, to justification of life.' Not to salvation, in the kingdom of God, but to justification of life, or release from Adamic death, in the resurrection of all mankind.

Again: 'For as by one man's disobedience 'hoi polloi,' the many were made sinners, so by the righteousness of one shall the many, 'hoi polloi,' be made righteous.' Rom. 5: 19. How many were made sinners 'by the disobedience of one?' 'So death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned.' Rom. 5: 12.

Here we may observe that the expression 'the many,' is equivalent to 'all,' and farther, that the effects of Christ's righteousness are as wide as those of Adam's sin. As many as suffered death by the sin of the one, shall be raised to life by the obedience of the other. Or in other words, 'As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.'

Again: it is written, 'The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' Mark 10: 45. How 'many' is the ransom for? Let Paul reply: 'There is one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus; who gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.' 1 Tim. 2: 5, 6. [illegible]

Let the true and faithful witness answer. 'All that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of condemnation.' John 5: 28, 29. And upon this basis of solemn prophetic assertion, there was ample room to rest that hope of which Paul makes mention when he says: 'After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets: and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, or expect that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.' Acts 24: 14, 15."

I find that what was intended only as a brief paragraph, has come to be a lengthy article. The importance of the subject, and the desire to present the facts needful for the understanding of the passage, must be my excuse for this prolixity. I trust it will need no further reference on my part. May God guide us unto all truth, and give us our portion with Daniel and all the faithful in the Resurrection of the just.

The Banner of Righteousness.

Air.—"Star Spangled Banner."

Oh, can you not see, by the gospel's pure light,
As it shines in its splendor, the lonely heart cheering,
The signs that foretell the approach of that night—
The night full of sorrow, and sighing, and fearing?
Soon the night will be gone, and the morning appear,
And it fills us with joy, for our heart is not here.
Oh, when will the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved?

See the signs in the air, on the earth, in the sea—
The blushing Aurora, a world's mighty wonder;
Distress of the nations and perplexity—
The sea and waves roaring with voices of thunder!
Sure, we cannot mistake, if we but keep awake,
The signs which the Lord has hung out for our sake.
Oh, soon will the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved.

Then lift up your heads; let the mourning now cease;
Who is this now approaching in glory and grandeur?
'Tis creation's great King; 'tis the fair Prince of peace,
Marching on to his throne from his bed in a manger!
Now the angels of light are his retinue bright,
And the heart is enraptured with seeing the sight.
Oh, then, let the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved.

In Immanuel's land we will always abide,
For our life will be long, and our days never-ending;
No war's dread alarms, nor death's surging tide,
Can reach that fair band, all in harmony blending.
Then we'll watch for the day, till the night wears away,
And the day-star appears with its beautiful ray.
Oh, then will the banner of righteousness wave
O'er the earth that's renewed, and a people who're saved.

Controversy.

Many of the controversies in this world are the result of mere misunderstandings. Men use terms undefined; they assert and deny—deny and assert—and often the argument passes from the original question to a dispute as to the meaning of the men who are disputing. Says one writer:—

"Disputants often become metaphysical, according to the explanation given of metaphysics by the Scotchman who said, 'Why, ye see, metaphysics is when two men are talking thegither, and ane of them dinna ken what he is talking about, and the ither canna understand him.' Drs. Chalmers and Stuart must have been a 'wee bit' metaphysical the day they got into a controversy about the nature of faith. Chalmers, compelled at length to leave his friend, said, 'I have time to say no more; but you will find my views fully and well put up in a recent tract, called "Difficulties in the way of believing."' 'Why,' exclaimed the astonished Dr. Stuart, 'that is my own tract; I published it myself!' That man was surely wise who prefaced every debate with 'Gentleman, define your terms.'"

It would not be strange when such men as Chalmers and Stuart were so befogged with words, that others of less ability, should also fight "as one that beateth the air." It is hardly possible for two men, when in heated discussion, to apprehend each other's minor differences of thought with precision. They look on one side only, and they do not easily see the strength of the positions on the other. Let two men go from an earnest dispute and write down their opponent's arguments, and ten chances to one each will misrepresent the other. Then, of course, if their reports were published, each would feel insulted and grieved and misrepresented. Each, of course, must correct the other, reply to his arguments, and dispute his assertions; and if they get through the whole without giving each other the lie direct, they may be set down as probably in a somewhat hopeful and gracious state.

Hence the wisdom of undertaking to tell what we think ourselves, and not undertaking to interpret, represent, or misrepresent the faith of others. Few can do it and escape the charge of inaccuracy or unfairness. God's means of preserving truth in the world is not controversy, but testimony. We speak the things we do know, and testify that we have seen. [illegible]

Sabbath Schools.

Bro. Grant:—This enterprise is one which commends itself to every christian. The training of the young is a duty which was made imperative by the Jewish laws. "Thou shalt diligently teach them to thy children, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up, and when thou walkest by the way," etc. One may infer from this that whenever they were in company with children, they were required to instruct them in the statutes and judgments of Jehovah, and this early training is undoubtedly one prominent reason why the Jews have maintained their identity so long.

We have also a command equally binding from our Saviour. "Feed my lambs," said he to Peter, and in the days of his flesh he took them in his arms and blessed them, and if we would be his followers and obey his commands, we must do likewise. That the Adventists have been remiss in Sabbath School instruction is apparent. There are many causes that have operated to bring about this state of things. 1. The preaching of the time of the Lord's coming called the attention of multitudes from this, and every thing else but the one idea of the Lord's speedy coming. 2. There has in many places been so much discord among brethren, that it was impossible for them to work in harmony in any branch of christian duty. Different views of Scripture doctrine have caused more trouble in the Advent church than all the opposition from outward opposers.

I think we might take a lesson of wisdom in this respect from the American Sunday School Union, which is composed of five different denominations, yet the most perfect harmony has characterized their movements from the commencement of this organization, and great have been the results of their labor. To their missionaries many churches in the west and other parts of the country owe their existence. But to return to ourselves. Should we not make a wise improvement of past experience, and gird on the armor anew in behalf of the little ones, and now, while there is a good prospect of success, put in the sickle and gather the harvest, before the coming storm sweeps over us and they are left out of the fold to perish.

We cannot close our eyes to the sure word of prophecy which says that in the last days perilous times shall come, and the greater the peril, the more caution is necessary. There will, in my opinion, be another time preached among us before the Lord comes, and shall we not be so thoroughly organized and "occupying," that when it is the true time, the Lord will say to us "well done"? And what more commendable duty could we be found engaged in, than feeding the lambs of the flock?

Much more might be said upon this subject, but, as I believe in short communications, as well as short prayers, I will give place for others. I will, however, simply suggest that, as we have no Sabbath School paper of a denominational character, one column of the Crisis be devoted especially to this cause, until there is a children's paper published among us.

Letter from Dr. Willard.

Dear Bro. Wendell:—Enclosed I send you a gold dollar for your excellent paper. Please direct to J. G. This brother has become recently interested in the life and death view of Bible doctrine, and not only him, but several of his neighbors are fully persuaded that there is no eternal life out of Christ. We were invited to that neighborhood last spring to address the people in our humble way, expecting violent opposition to our "peculiar views," as they are termed; but taking special care to back up by Scripture references our position; none could gainsay or call us in question, and the honest ones began to give credence to the truth, as the Spirit seemed to sanction the word spoken, although in great weakness. Added to our poor labors, we disseminated among them sundry tracts, which, under God, have been made a blessing to several adults, and we doubt not will, in the end, prove a great blessing among the Sunday school children with whom we meet. An increasing interest is quite obvious, and we feel greatly encouraged to labor on, knowing that God will honor his word and verify his promise that it "shall not return void, but accomplish that whereunto it is sent." God is able, through the weakest instrumentalities, to bring light out of darkness, and by making the truth appear in contrast with the many fabulous creeds so generally believed, glorify his name thereby.

But the true church of Christ will, in all probability, have to undergo trial, and it may be tribulations, for the enemy is rampant among us already, and, if we apprehend the prophetic word, persecutions even unto death may await the faithful and persevering, and when "the great day of his wrath is come, who shall be able to stand?" May the good Lord guide us unto his coming and kingdom, is my prayer.

Yours in christian bonds,

R. Willard.

Religion and Business.

"They are saying, sir, that you are neglecting your business, and that it must suffer."

"Who says it?" says the employer.

"All your neighbors along the street, sir."

Do any christians say it?"

"Well, I hardly know whether they are christians or not; I suppose not. But I thought I ought to let you know what was said. Besides there is a good deal of money to be paid, and I do not know where it is coming from."

"How much are you short?"

"About six hundred to-day, and other bills mature to-morrow and next day, and I felt anxious to know how they are to be met."

"Do you believe our Savior meant any thing when he said, 'Seek first the kingdom of heaven."

"Certainly I do."

"Well, what do suppose he meant?"

"Oh, I do not know. I have never thought of it. Perhaps I should not be able to answer it if I should try. But I do not think that business is to be neglected."

"I am very much astonished to hear you, a professor of religion, talk in this way. As for me, I believe he means just what he says, and I mean to do literally what he requires. I do not neglect my business. I know what paper is maturing, and I do not give myself the least uneasiness about it. I used all proper diligence and the rest I leave to God."

When speaking of it, the merchant said, "I knew where I could lay my hand on the money at once, though I did not tell my clerk of it. I went to the noon-day prayer-meeting as usual. On coming home after one P. M., I asked my clerk about the means to meet my bills for to-day."

"Oh, said he, "we are all right. Mr. B— has been in, and has paid $1,800 and some other money has come in."

"This $1,800 was a bad debt, which I never expected to be paid," said the merchant. So the Lord takes care of me, while I take care of the affairs of my own soul and the souls of others, and seek first the kingdom of heaven."

This man is one of the new recruits into the great army. His hand, his heart, his mind, are ready for every good work, every good word, and no duty is left undone.

Said a salesman in one of our heavy wholesale houses to a young and honest disciple of Christ:

"You ought not to have said what you did to that buyer. I sold him the goods at a good price, for cash—remember, cash—and now he will not take them."

"He asked me about the goods, and I told him the truth, that they were damaged. I cannot tell a lie for all the goods there are in the store; and I will not," said the young clerk.

"I am sorry,—I am very sorry," said the salesman, "to say that I must report you to the firm. But I feel it my duty to do it. I cannot be balked in this way, when I have done a good thing for the employers, to have it all upset by your squeamishness. I must go back to the counting-room, and report you."

"Very well," said the clerk, "I will go with you, and go now. I shall tell them honestly the whole transaction, and we will see what they have to say to your fleecing a customer in this way."

The salesman's courage failed, for within a few weeks the leading member of that firm had been converted, and he was a little afraid he might be disposed to "do his business on christian principles," so he did not risk the appeal, and report.

This clerk was but a mere boy of nineteen. We are happy to know that many a pious young man has made up his mind to do honor to his christian profession, and not compromise himself by following the "laws of trade."—Power of prayer.

All Earthly Investments Unsafe.

How many instances of this truth have come under the personal knowledge of each one of us. Perhaps of those who with great patience and trouble accumulate wealth, the larger part lose it before they die, and little ever remains to the third generation. A single mistake may deprive a man of the fruits of half a century of prudence. We know a careful and successful man, who by perseverance and sagacity had got together three-fourths of a million of dollars. He had not long retired from trade, and reached threescore and ten, when in an unfortunate moment he entered into an engagement which swept away all his estate. His "riches made themselves wings and fled away." This is not a solitary case by any means. It is a thing of common occurrence. No wisdom or caution can secure against it. The most prudent men in the country are often ruined by mistakes of judgment, or by dishonesty of others, or unforeseen accidents. We were once in the counting-house of an old merchant, when a clergyman entered and asked for his advice as to the best investment of a small sum of money. The clergyman observed that his desire was to put his little treasure where it would be entirely safe. The merchant laughed aloud at the "greenness" of his clerical friend, and told him if such was his purpose he must seek investment beyond this world, for security had never been found in it. A very careful gentleman of our acquaintance, with whom saving and secure investment were the sole business of life, would have all his property in real estate, and particularly he preferred ground-rents. These he thought were the safest of all securities. Unexpectedly an unsatisfied judgment of long standing found against a tract of land which had now become part of a city, where this gentleman had purchased many rents. To satisfy this judgment cost him what to most men would be a large fortune.

But if attained riches do not bring happiness, the pursuit of them nourishes avarice, and avarice is always poor. Solomon says, "There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."—There is also positive poverty, growing out of excessive value of money and and morbid dread of want, is the common consequence of covetousness. It is the "fiend's" arch-mock of the soul whom he has deluded with the prospective joys of wealth. Riches are attended with care and trouble. [illegible] ents of others. The rich have what all others want, and the life of him who has to preserve wealth is necessarily a life of suspicion, and contention, and anxiety. "In the revenues of the wicked is trouble," and all are wicked who make this world their portion. Riches are not a refuge from the ills of life, nor from the wrath of God. Their advantages cover but a few years of an eternal existence. It is supreme folly to make the pursuit of them the business of life. Many have experienced this who would have avoided the sad experience had they pondered the words of Solomon: "Riches profit not in the day of wrath. He that trusteth in his riches shall fall. Labor not to be rich. Cease from thine own wisdom. Wilt thou set thine eyes upon that which is not? for riches certainly make themselves wings: they fly away as an eagle toward heaven."

Youth's Department.

Soldiers and War.

My young readers have often been delighted to witness the military parade. They are pleased with the sound of soul-stirring music, the glitter of bright guns and swords, and the tramp of the war-horse. They follow the company on its march through the streets, and hasten to the muster-field to see the sham-fight. They wish they were old enough to train, that they might have a drum or a gun. They see nothing in all this show and parade that appears wrong, or that can do any harm. But think, reader, what are the soldiers learning? Are they not practising the art of war? And what is this but learning to kill men? What are the guns and swords for but to kill and murder others?

John is proud to follow the company in which his father and brother trains. He wishes he were old enough to march with them. But suppose to-morrow that same company should be called out to go to the battle-field, where they must kill others, and probably be killed themselves. How would John feel as he heard the music, and saw them leave their happy homes, their children, their wives, their farms, and their dearest friends, never to see them again? Would he run after them, and shout, and wish he could be a soldier? If other soldiers from other countries should come and kill his mother, and murder his brothers and sisters, and burn his house and village, would he think it a fine thing to be a soldier? No; but this is their business. They march and exercise, and fire, that they may learn all this.

See an army marching to meet their enemy, with powder and balls, with cannon and swords, to kill and conquer. Would you like to be with them? Would you like to have your father or brother among them, and hear that they had died on the bloody field, and been trampled to the earth by the fierce war-horse? Think, before you choose and pursue any course, what it will lead to, and whether God will be pleased with it.—Stories for Children.

Never do Mischief.

A very fine looking boy, named Henry, lived near one of our large public schools. There were other boys living in the same house with Henry.

One night, two of the boys planned together to frighten Henry. So one of them hid himself under Henry's bed. About midnight a loud rap was heard at the door, and in stalked the other boy.

He was frightfully dressed in a white sheet, and had a lighted candle in his hand. Just as he came in the boy under the bed raised his back, and heaved up the bed in which Henry was lying.

Now mark what took place. Henry did not rise as early as usual that morning, and when some of the family went to call him, he would only answer by strange noises and cries. His reason was gone—he was deranged!

In the course of the first year after this, his reason seemed to come to him again. Thus what took place was partly made known. Some other things were found out by one of the boys.

But Henry's reason soon left him again, and he became a perfect idiot. True, he was not violent, and never engaged in tearing and throwing things about the room.

He was harmless and gentle, and continued so for many years. But in the night, at about the time when the boys frightened him, he would cry out with horror, "Oh, they are coming! they are coming!"—200 Stories for Children, by T. M. Preble.

The Brave Boy.

I was sitting by a window in the second story of one of the large boarding houses at Saratoga Springs, thinking of absent friends, when I heard shouts of children from the piazza beneath me.

"O, yes; that's capital! so we will! Come on now! There's William Hale! Come on, William; we're going to have a ride on the Circular Railway. Come with us!"

"Yes, if my mother is willing. I will run and ask her," replied William.

"O, O! so you must run and ask your ma! Great baby, run along to your ma! Ain't you ashamed? I didn't ask my mother." "Nor I," "nor I," added a half-dozen voices.

"Be a man, William," cried the first voice; "come along with us, if you don't want to be called a coward as long as you live. Don't you see we're all waiting?"

I leaned forward to catch a view of the children, and saw William standing with one foot advanced, and his hand firmly clenched, in the midst of the group. He was a fine subject for a painter at that moment. His flushed brow, flashing eye, compressed lip, and changing cheek, all told how that word, coward, was rankling in his breast. Will he prove himself indeed one, by yielding to them? thought I. It was with breathless interest I listened for an answer, for I feared that the evil principle in his heart would be stronger than the good. But no.

"I will not go without I ask my mother!" said the noble boy, his voice trembling with emotion, "and I am no coward either. I promised her I would not go from the house without permission, and I should be a false coward if I were to tell her a wicked lie."

There was something commanding in his tone, which made the noisy children mute. It was the power of a strong soul over [illegible]

For the Crisis.

Evening Prayer.

Oh! my heart has grown aweary,
Weary of its sin;
When will ope the gates of heaven?
When shall I begin,
Chanting the celestial glories
Of that world of bliss,
With a heart that turneth ever
From the things of this?

Father! earth is filled with blessing,
All my sky is fair;
Thou art boundless loving kindness,
Keep me 'neath thy care,
For thou knowest, heavenly Father,
I am weak and small,
And allow these pleasures of en
To be all in all.

I would take these blessed tokens
As Thou giv'st them me,
With a grateful heart—yet, Father,
Keep me close to thee!

Let the portal of Thy dwelling
Ever stand ajar,
So the rays of heaven may show me
Where my wanderings are:
Mark the way from earth to heaven
With a line of light;
Keep my wayward feet from straying,
Keep the path in sight.

There are precious ones, O Father!
Thou did'st give them me,—
May the light which guides me upward
Lead them on to Thee.
May we walk together heavenward,
Leaning on Thy rod;
May we, when the journey closes,
Rest for aye with God.

Evening Shadows.—No. 12.

BY S. S. BREWER.

"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire, and pillars of smoke. And the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come."—JOEL.

In the above quotation of holy writ, God in a manifest manner most mercifully exhibits a deep solicitude towards the generation living on earth at the time when this day of wrath shall burst on the world. His design is doubtless to draw our affections from the perishing objects of the present life, so prone to divide our wavering minds, and cause us, by the study of his ever blessed word, to mark in the fulfillment of the above prediction the unerring precursors of earth's day of doom.

O how unlike the expectations of many is the above language of inspiration! "The great and TERRIBLE DAY," "the great day of his wrath," and many such declarations, express naught else but entire destruction upon all the wicked. "Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God."

The following article was taken, some years since, from a London paper. A more perfect fulfillment of a part of Joel's prophecy no one can possibly desire. See "Christian Advocate and Journal," Sept. 13th, 1839.

"London, Sept. 5th. Between the hours of ten on Tuesday night and three yesterday morning, in the heavens was observed one of the most magnificent specimens of those extraordinary phenomena—the falling stars and northern lights—witnessed for many years past. The first indication of this singular phenomena was about ten minutes before ten, when a light crimson, apparently vapor, rose from the northern portion of the hemisphere, and gradually extended to the centre of the heavens; and by ten o'clock, or a quarter past, the whole, from east to west, was one vast sheet of light. It had a MOST ALARMING APPEARANCE, and was exactly like that occasioned by a TERRIFIC FIRE. The light varied considerably; at one time it seemed to fall, and directly rose with intense brightness. There were to be seen mingled with it volumes of SMOKE, which rolled over and over, and every beholder seemed convinced that it was 'a tremendous conflagration.' The consternation in the metropolis was very great; thousands of persons were running in the direction of the supposed awful catastrophe. The engines belonging to the fire brigade stations in Baker street, Farringdon street, Watling street, Waterloo road, and likewise those belonging to the west of England station—in fact every fire engine in London—were horsed, and galloped after the supposed scene of destruction, with more than ordinary energy, followed by carriages, horsemen, and vast [illegible]. Some of the engines proceeded as far as Highgate and Holloway before the error was discovered. These appearances lasted for upwards of two hours, and towards morning the spectacle became one of more grandeur.

At two o'clock in the morning the phenomena presented a most gorgeous scene, one very difficult to describe. The whole of London was illuminated as light as noon day, and the atmosphere was remarkably clear. The Southern hemisphere, at the time mentioned, although unclouded, was very dark; but the stars, which were innumerable, shone beautifully. The opposite side of the heavens presented a singular but magnificent contrast; it was clear to the extreme, and the light was varied and very vivid; there was a continual succession of meteors, which varied in splendor. They appeared formed in the centre of the heavens, and spread till they seemed to burst. The effect was electrical; myriads of small stars shot out over the horizon, and darted with that swiftness towards the earth that the eye could scarcely follow the track; they seemed to burst also, and to throw a dark crimson or vapor over the entire hemisphere. The colors were most magnificent. At half-past two o'clock the spectacle changed to darkness, which, on dispersing, displayed a luminous rainbow in the zenith of the heavens and around the ridge of darkness that overhung the southern portion of the country. Soon afterwards columns of silvery light radiated from it. They increased wonderfully, intermingled among crimson vapor, which formed at the same time, and when at full height, the spectacle was beyond all imagination; stars were darting about in all directions, and continued until four o'clock, when all died away. During the time that they lasted, a great many persons assembled on the bridge across the Thames, where they had a commanding view of the heavens, and watched the progress of the phenomena attentively."

In the above we have some of the WONDERS in the heavens—FIRE and PILLARS OF SMOKE. In the "Modern Phenomena of the Heavens" we have another testimony corroborative of the fulfillment of the last day wonders in the heavens:—

"Jan. 25, 1837. The very heavens for a short time seemed to be on fire, when the snow upon the ground much resembled blood and fire; which was so alarming in appearance as to cause the solemn inquiry, with some who were out at the time, if the day of judgment had come, and also to cause the animals to tremble with fear. In one place, near a mountain, the people informed me that on the snow there was the appearance of 'waves of fire rolling down the mountain.'"

Thus, dear reader, God has in the most positive manner fulfilled thus far a prediction uttered two thousand six hundred years ago. Another declaration uttered by the prophet claims our attention. "The sun shall be turned into darkness" "before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." Has this been fulfilled? is the next question. We answer, in the most emphatic sense, it has. There is abundant testimony on this very solemn and interesting point. I shall, however, present but few.

"The Dark day of May 19, 1780.—The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours, at length, the sky became overcast with clouds, and by ten o'clock, A. M. the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts, and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day; and the night till near morning was as unusually dark as the day."—Gage's History of Rowley, Mass.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man, for his lamp was trimmed and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude. His nephew, who was then a little child, in after life retained a lively recollection of that scene, and his childish feelings are an interesting exhibition of the manner in which Mr. Lee was regarded, for he felt not the least alarm in his presence, thinking that he was perfectly safe where his good uncle was, even if the day of judgment had come."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society.—Life of Edward Lee of Mass.

Having seen a most perfect fulfillment thus far, we shall in the next place proceed to show that the last sign enumerated by the prophet as the unerring precursor of the GREAT DAY OF GOD'S WRATH, has been witnessed. And in view of this solemn fact I am often compelled to exclaim, O how unbelieving is the great mass, and how few in reality believe the word of God! "The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood."

The following article was published in the "Philadelphia Inquirer," and dated Fort Leavenworth, Mi., March 20, 1843:—

"On the 14th of Feb. we had the most remarkable phenomena here that I ever heard of, except the falling stars. At three A. M. the moon, which had been obscured by a cloud for some hours, burst forth, of a DEEP BLOOD-RED COLOR, with a black cross of equal proportions over the face, but not extending beyond the rim; while on the two sides, small pieces of a rainbow were visible. After continuing in this way for about an hour, the color of the moon changed to its ordinary hue, and the cross became a silvery white, with the edges extending beyond the rim, and touched the rainbow."

The following is from the "Missionary Herald" of June, 1842, p. 234. It is an account of an earthquake at that place in 1822. He says:—

"On the night of the earthquake there was something peculiar in the atmosphere, the moon appearing red as blood. This greatly alarmed the inhabitants, who were continually crying out 'Now we shall hear the trumpet sound! and the dead will rise! the day of judgment has arrived!'"

Thus has the Almighty in his abounding mercy been pleased to write the history of these great and wonderful signs in the heavens over two thousand years in advance, as the evidences of the last days, in order to test the faith of the judgment generation, which I most solemnly and unhesitatingly believe the present to be. Truly these are the last, the very last days; all the signs that uncreated benevolence promised, as so many godly admonitions, to stir and encourage his saints to diligence in order to be ready and waiting for his appearing, have been fulfilled. We are now rushing into the last jot of prophecy that the adorable Redeemer declared should clearly distinguish the closing moments of time. We have had signs in the sun, moon and stars, and now, lo and behold, "distress of nations and perplexity."

"Lift your heads, ye friends of Jesus!
Partners in his patience here;
Christ to all believers precious—
Lord of lords will soon appear,
Mark the tokens of his heavenly kingdom near."

Truly the shadows of the evening are stretched out. Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus.

We bespeak for the following the prayerful attention of our readers. It is time we give more attention to the subject of "holiness, without which no man can see the Lord." The Bride must make herself ready; and in order to this must be found without spot, and blameless. We hope Bro. D. and other of our contributors will favor us with more upon this important subject. For the Crisis.

To those who Hunger and Thirst after Righteousness.

When the children of God are convinced of the need of sanctifying grace, and to this end have a clear sight of their remaining inbred corruptions, Satan frequently tempts them to believe they have never known God's justifying grace. He tells them so much impurity of heart cannot consist with the divine favor. But remember, he makes known what is wrong in the heart, as you are able to bear it, that you may fly to that blood for cleansing which can make the foulest clean. Let this conviction be improved, that by faith you may lay hold on the promise, which offers a fulness to all who hunger and thirst after righteousness.

The people of God under their afflictions are often tempted to an impatience to be freed. But they should wait calmly for the time God has appointed for their deliverence. It is of more importance to you to have grace properly to bear and improve your afflictions, than to be entirely delivered from them. To be supported under them, may so sanctify as to render them the greatest blessing. But if, according to your own desire, you could break away from them, it might prove your ruin. God sees it needful for his people to be tried, and why should you complain? Satan may suggest, if you could see the end of these afflictions, and how they were to terminate for your good, you would have no cause of complaint or anxiety; but, as they are now circumstanced, you have real cause for both. But it will be well to consider that one of the brightest excellencies of the christian faith is to confide in God in the darkest hour of affliction, with an assurance that, in so doing, he will conduct your affairs for his own glory and your good. If the event and all connected circumstanstances were known, there would be little or no trial of your faith; and to grow uneasy because of it, is to wish your faith might never be put to the trial.

Had Abraham known God would have released his son, and accepted for a sacrifice a ram which his tender faithfulness had provided, what he did could have been no great trial of his faith. But when he is seen going forward in obedience to the command, although he could see no way for God to accomplish his promise, it can be no subject of wonder to hear the apostle say, "he did not stagger at the promise, through faith giving glory to God."

Had Daniel certainly known God would have stopped the mouths of the lions, or the three worthies that he would have quenched the violence of the fire, a very small degree of faith and christian fortitude would have been sufficient for their support. But, as they were ignorant of the method he would take to glorify himself, and save them, and as they calmly confided in him, though thick clouds and darkness rested on the event, there was something in their faith and conduct worthy of imitation. And many like instances might be found where the people of God have trusted him in the darkest hour, and have been gloriously delivered.

To be impatient of deliverance before the time God appoints, or to wish it in any other way than his wisdom directs, is in effect to wish God may not be glorified, or our own souls benefitted. Against this we have need to watch and pray, and in all trials look earnestly to God for supporting grace, and leave the time and manner of deliverance entirely with him; by so doing, we may find our trials so sanctified as to further us in the way of holiness; casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you. Be sober, be vigilant, and humble yourselves under his mighty hand, and he will fill and exalt you in due time, for he hath called us unto his eternal glory, and, after we have suffered a while, he will make us perfect, and will establish, and strengthen, and settle us. To him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

The Glorious Keeping.

"Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

A place of safety in times of danger has been the inherent desire of human beings since the world began. Adam, the great prototype of mankind, when conscious of his guilt in disobeying the law of God, sought at once to hide himself from the searching glance of the Being he had offended. But no place of safety was afforded; his flimsy covering of fig leaves and temporary hiding place could not secure him from the piercing eye of the God that made him. Hence he was bidden to come forth, and endure the scrutiny of Him who can by no means uphold the guilty, or look upon sin with the least degree of allowance. Thus it has ever been in all ages of the world with sin and sinners,—seeking a temporary place of safety to hide them from their guilt and its attendant consequences; and thus will it be until the heavens shall depart "as a scroll, when it is rolled together," and "every mountain and island" be "moved out of their places;" and the wicked of every grade and name, "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men," shall "hide themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains," saying to the "mountains and rocks fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" This will be the language of the finally impenitent; but their outer darkness, their wailings and gnashing of teeth must be endured, while nought but a "fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation" will devour all adversaries who are found without life and immortality, as brought to light through the gospel.

While this is the fearful doom of the wicked, thanks be to God for his "unspeakable gift." The righteous, those who by patient continuance in well doing have sought for glory and eternal life, through the blood of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, will not be disappointed. Jesus, the Mediator, to whom they have given their hearts in a life-time obedience, has become their surety, paid their debt, and accomplished their ransom; and now, in the hour of their need, all along their earthly journey, stands forth for their deliverance, affording them the blest assurance that no weapon formed against them shall prosper, but out of every danger and temptation there shall be made a way of escape. This is the abiding inheritance of every true child of God. The precious promises are all his own, not one of which will fail him in his time of need.

But this is not all his consolation, enjoying the life that now is; there is a day of trouble at hand, a death struggle, which each must know for himself and not another, a day of judgment, of separation of the righteous from the wicked. Then appears the glorious keeping, the precious hiding place, the sure retreat from the gathering storm, "the munition of rocks," the tower of safety to all those who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. Hear the blessed Savior saying, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." And to the christians of these days in which we live, has not the trial hour, the day of temptation, almost or quite come? Our beloved country is convulsed with war, brother rising against brother, while pride and oppression stalk boldly forth, and equity and justice seem fallen in our streets. And because of this iniquity abounding, the love of many has waxed cold; only here and there we note the pure and true representatives of the meek and lowly Jesus.

O! as christians, shall we not more than ever examine ourselves, to know whether we be in the faith or not? Shall we not trim our lamps afresh, that they brightly burn amid the moral darkness that surrounds us, and examine our purposes of holiness, our decision of religious character, if so be they shall stand the jostlings of this time-serving age; or, be ready with our loins girt about, should our Lord come at the first, second, or third watch? The day approaches that "shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." But those whose trust is in the name of the Lord, will be numbered among his jewels, acknowledged and accepted at the marriage supper of the Lamb. M. A. T.

Will.

In every phase of life, there are found loose, roving notions of selfish aggrandizement. The growth of moral discipline may do much to check the outbursting of this innate principle, but there is no cause to brand this effect with an universal curse.

The man of business habits, whose life is made up of change and circumstance, prosecutes a plan that is peculiar to the notions and proclivities which are the groundwork of success. He never feels disposed to concede the impracticability of any purpose, for the reason, that he never guages causes by results. The merit or demerit involved is not so much a matter of consequence, as the aggrandizement resulting from its completion. It is worth something to be satisfied,—to have gained a moral victory over moral discouragements; and if not one jot or tittle of substantial emolument is secured to fill the vacuum of delinquencies, he is quite refreshed to know that he has satisfied himself, at least, of his power of endurance.

But it is not easily proved that this seeming inconsistency, when rightly executed, is not productive of good. There are enough who are ready to stamp sin upon the face of all intelligence that does not comport favorably with their notions of holiness; but how many of the religious world dare assume the responsibility of compiling a category of actual sins, and with their budget of demerit, prescribe a cure in vindication of the character of God? It may be he loves the Lord with all his heart, soul, might, mind and strength; but it is very doubtful whether, through this relation, he becomes proficient in the doctrine of abstract evil. In the absence of a defence, an argument assumes wondrous proportions. A man who undertakes to filter the doctrine of human depravity through a strata of dogmatical views, has succeeded only in his own estimation. The thunders of Demosthenes rolled at a distance from Philip and his hosts; and Tully poured forth his fiercest torrent of vindictive when Cataline was at a distance and his dagger no longer to be feared.

Saith God, "I make peace and create evil." Why, in the divine economy, may not the fact (not the theory) of human depravity be compatible with and accessory to the highest good? When God says to a benighted heart, "Let there be light," notwithstanding the cold, embryotic shadow that for the age enshrouded it has vanished before the light of God,—does the transfer clandestinely rob the favored one of an element which through unshackled freedom springs forth to praise the Lord? Never. The same inveterate will which fashioned him a minion of slavish passion, now, with new-born energy leads him to undertake the noblest task of God. To social life he becomes of priceless worth, and, in the warfare of life's elements, a giant conqueror under heaven's Chieftain.

Because some men may fail of obtaining eternal life, it is a gross imputation to assume that God either drew an unequivocal line between moral character and the mercy of Christ, or that his own grace was inefficient in exercising control over the human passions; for the reason, He never yet required men to become morally purified, and then become spiritually perfected. "Give me thine heart" is the requisition; become like little children. Whoever heard of children becoming morally purified? By implication, they are no less naturally depraved than the man of years; the germ of unholiness ripens with increasing age, and yet God says, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." He saves such. In the economy of HIM, hereditary evil procured for lost men a plan of redemption sufficiently inherent with saving grace to comprehend in its capacity all men; but in the absence of such redemption, the theory of Adamic evil would hardly support the language of Jesus. The transfer of the affections from actual sin to the government of Christ, does not exclude us from the blighting taint of the "Serpent's" trail; for it is "appointed unto men once to die"—the natural result of sin—a declension from a developing process towards immortality to a corruptible dissolving condition. The transfer, or change of mind, may not imply loss of ambition. "Repent"—change your mind—"and be converted." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Not repent of human nature. Nicodemus' incredulity concerning being "born again," left Christ to explain to him a plan of regeneration, operating only through sympathy between him and God; while the contumacious thief lost no atom of intellectual vigor through the sudden transition of a despairing suppliant.

But, finally, does an individual, through a lack of elements requisite to a finished vocalist, become less susceptible of moral worth? Or because men's inherent passions incite them to deeds of darkness, does condition forever alienate them from the life and power of God? That malicious victim of unbridled passion, "Saul of Tarsus," was led through the power of Christ to defend and prosecute his work with the same indomitable, unwavering will with which he persecuted the saints of God. It was the foolish things of this world confounding the wise, and the weak things of this world confounding the mighty. It was making the wrath of man to praise God. In his physical, as well as his moral government, his creative power adapts the mind for each separate task assigned it. He of lofty intellect, expansive genius, and creative imagination, inherited the elements as his birthright. They grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength; and however much the contaminating hoof of sin may have warped and cramped his moral life, he is noble still; for he holds his greatest worth subservient to the will of his Maker; and, through a conformation to His government, he becomes the Pharos of the world. It is the mystical acquaintance with the Judge of Heaven that adjusts and guides the living, acting will of man, and crumbles into dust the broken reed that so long impierced the trusted side. Let him that possesses an iron will, bewail no longer the exhausting struggle that makes his life a battle-field, for God's own beneficent hand wrought the undeveloped plan that may ultimately result in a growth of heavenly excellence, when he shall take his place in the centre of the crown that canopies o'er him, and hears the gracious words, blushing with tints of love, "Fear not, my saints." To You.

Yes, whoever reads this, if converted or not, may read, "To you" especially; I am speaking to you. I am sitting before an open door. All around me I see the beautiful works of our Creator. Do I not hear a voice from them? "The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord endureth forever." "All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass." Here are two of the many thoughts suggested to my mind; and here is one I wish to present to your mind, most seriously. Do you think God made all these beauties of nature for a higher and more exalted object than the satisfaction of our appetites, or the gratification of our love of these beauties? You say "yes" in your heart, for who will acknowledge he has no higher order of intellect than this would require. Will not the Giver of this intellect and appreciation require that you improve your talent, and profit by these lessons which are before you constantly? Have you not seen, day after day, a constant change in nature; her works fading away until the forest was bare and drear; the ground covered with snow, and no vestige of the earth's beautiful dress remaining? Have you not seen her in the spring, again arrayed in her robe of green, while the birds warbled their songs of praise, the lambs skipped and played, and the cattle were grazing on her thousand hills? What did you learn from this? God's holy word, which shall judge you at the last day, says, "Where much is given, much will be required"; leaving you to trace the analogy between this and your own life, all but the last lesson. This change happeneth to all nature's works.

You know how summer is fast passing away, your harvest nearly ended; you must soon put off your summer dress. I pause—for here you must think. Your winter, like the plants, will be dark and drear. Think again—will you ever come forth in a spring dress, a robe of righteousness? Ah! I am talking to you now. Will you ever come forth from your dark winter, called by the Son of righteousness, (who will restore this groaning earth to its Eden state,) to receive the fine linen which is to be the dress of the saints? If you have never been converted, I warn you, in the name of my Master, to flee the wrath to come; flee to Christ, who died for you, that through him you might have eternal life. You have had christian parents, from whose lips has often ascended a prayer, that a "prodigal son" might return. You have often knelt by that mother, heard her earnest entreaties that you might be plucked, a brand out of the fire. Has her prayer been answered? Why? You were not willing. The result is, you are lost, without you flee to Christ. I am talking to you. You have resisted these gracious influences so long, I fear the door will soon be shut to you. You say your parents never prayed with you. Have you not heard Christ, when you read the prayer he offered up while agonizing in the garden, "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also who shall believe on me, through their word." Here is a prayer from a brother, if you believe. Where are you? Out of Christ; alas! your only hope.

How was it with the antediluvians? They were out of the ark; were they saved? No. Oft repeated invitations were slighted; oft was the "preacher of righteousness" disregarded, just as you have done many times; but when Noah went in at the appointed time, the door was shut. Are you in Christ? To you I am speaking, while the door is open. How did you get in? by the door, or some other way? David said, "Open me the gates of righteousness, that I may go in to them." Listen to Christ—"I am the door; by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved. I am the good shepherd, and have given my life for the sheep." "The God of peace has brought from the dead that good shepherd, that through him you might have life." How, and when, did you get into Christ? Ask yourself this question seriously and solemnly. Are there no doubtings, no misgivings? "He that climbeth up some other way is a thief and a robber." No one but yourself can answer; for you have this assurance, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God"; and it is only in Christ we can be accepted. I am talking plainly; but Paul says, "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? . . . For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, (is'nt this strong language he uses?) we shall be in the likeness of his resurrection." You never thought about it! Now I will ask you, who said, "Search the Scriptures"? And have you obeyed? Do you imagine none but the "eight souls" thought they should be saved? I have no doubt many thought there was "time enough"; they could stay on the outside, or climb up some other way, than to go into an open door. Did they? No, the door was shut. That ark was a type of Christ, and not of the church. This is the Lamb's wife—the body, not the Head. Peter says, "eight souls were saved by water; the like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Leave out the sentence in brackets, and how does it say we are saved? Paul had the same idea—"planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be in the likeness of his resurrection." O, my friend, whoever you are, may you listen to one who speaks in the name of his Master. O may you take heed; and may this seed fall into good and honest hearts, which shall bear fruit abundantly; remembering there is an enemy who will sow tares among the wheat, which will be allowed to grow until the harvest. Flee to the ark of safety.

Behold the ark of God,
Behold the open door;
Haste to that blest abode,
And rove, my soul, no more.
There safe shalt thou abide,
There sweet shall be thy rest;
All longings satisfied,
With full salvation blest.
And when the waves of ire
Again the earth shall fill,
We'll ride the sea of fire,
Then rest on Zion's hill.

For the Crisis.

Evening Prayer.

Oh! my heart has grown aweary,
Weary of its sin;
When will ope the gates of heaven?
When shall I begin,
Chanting the celestial glories
Of that world of bliss,
With a heart that turneth ever
From the things of this?

Father! earth is filled with blessing,
All my sky is fair;
Thou art boundless living kindness,
Keep me 'neath thy care;
For thou knowest, heavenly Father,
I am weak and small,
And allow these pleasures of earth
To be all in all.

I would take these blessed tokens
As Thou giv'st them me,
With a grateful heart—yet, Father,
Keep me close to thee!

Let the portal of Thy dwelling
Ever stand ajar,
So the rays of heaven may show me
Where my wanderings are:
Mark the way from earth to heaven
With a line of light;
Keep my wayward feet from straying,
Keep the path in sight.

There are precious ones, O Father!
Thou did'st give them me,—
May the light which guides me upward
Lead them on to Thee.
May we walk together heavenward,
Leaning on Thy rod;
May we, when the journey closes,
Rest for aye with God.

Evening Shadows.—No. 12.

BY S. S. BREWER.

"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth, blood and fire, and pillars of smoke. And the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come."—JOEL.

In the above quotation of holy writ, God in a manifest manner most mercifully exhibits a deep solicitude towards the generation living on earth at the time when this day of wrath shall burst on the world. His design is doubtless to draw our affections from the perishing objects of the present life, so prone to divide our wavering minds, and cause us, by the study of his ever blessed word, to mark in the fulfillment of the above prediction the unerring precursors of earth's day of doom.

O how unlike the expectations of many is the above language of inspiration! "The great and TERRIBLE DAY," "the great day of his wrath," and many such declarations, express naught else but entire destruction upon all the wicked. "Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God."

The following article was taken, some years since, from a London paper. A more perfect fulfillment of a part of Joel's prophecy no one can possibly desire. See "Christian Advocate and Journal," Sept. 13th, 1839.

"London, Sept. 5th. Between the hours of ten on Tuesday night and three yesterday morning, in the heavens was observed one of the most magnificent specimens of these extraordinary phenomena—the falling stars and northern lights—witnessed for many years past. The first indication of this singular phenomena was about ten minutes before ten, when a light crimson, apparently vapor, rose from the northern portion of the hemisphere, and gradually extended to the centre of the heavens; and by ten o'clock, or a quarter past, the whole, from east to west, was one vast sheet of light. It had a MOST ALARMING APPEARANCE, and was exactly like that occasioned by a TERRIFIC FIRE. The light varied considerably; at one time it seemed to fall, and directly rose with intense brightness. There were to be seen mingled with it VOLUMES OF SMOKE, which rolled over and over, and every beholder seemed convinced that it was 'a tremendous conflagration.' The consternation in the metropolis was very great; thousands of persons were running in the direction of the supposed awful catastrophe. The engines belonging to the fire brigade stations in Baker street, Farringdon street, Watling street, Waterloo road, and likewise those belonging to the west of England station—in fact every fire engine in London—were horsed, and galloped after the supposed scene of destruction, with more than ordinary energy, followed by carriages, horsemen, and vast [illegible] far as Highgate and Holloway before the error was discovered. These appearances lasted for upwards of two hours, and towards morning the spectacle became one of more grandeur.

At two o'clock in the morning the phenomena presented a most gorgeous scene, one very difficult to describe. The whole of London was illuminated as light as noon day, and the atmosphere was remarkably clear. The Southern hemisphere, at the time mentioned, although unclouded, was very dark; but the stars, which were innumerable, shone beautifully. The opposite side of the heavens presented a singular but magnificent contrast; it was clear to the extreme, and the light was varied and very vivid; there was a continual succession of meteors, which varied in splendor. They appeared formed in the centre of the heavens, and spread till they seemed to burst. The effect was electrical; myriads of small stars shot out over the horizon, and darted with that swiftness towards the earth that the eye could scarcely follow the track; they seemed to burst also, and to throw a dark crimson or vapor over the entire hemisphere. The colors were most magnificent. At half-past two o'clock the spectacle changed to darkness, which, on dispersing, displayed a luminous rainbow in the zenith of the heavens and around the ridge of darkness that overhung the southern portion of the country. Soon afterwards columns of silvery light radiated from it. They increased wonderfully, intermingled among crimson vapor, which formed at the same time, and when at full height, the spectacle was beyond all imagination; stars were darting about in all directions, and continued until four o'clock, when all died away. During the time that they lasted, a great many persons assembled on the bridge across the Thames, where they had a commanding view of the heavens, and watched the progress of the phenomena attentively."

In the above we have some of the WONDERS IN THE HEAVENS—FIRE AND PILLARS OF SMOKE. In the "Modern Phenomena of the Heavens" we have another testimony corroborative of the fulfillment of the last day wonders in the heavens:—

"Jan. 25, 1837. The very heavens for a short time seemed to be on fire, when the snow upon the ground much resembled blood and fire; which was so alarming in appearance as to cause the solemn inquiry, with some who were out at the time, if the day of judgment had come, and also to cause the animals to tremble with fear. In one place, near a mountain, the people informed me that on the snow there was the appearance of 'waves of fire rolling down the mountain.'"

Thus, dear reader, God has in the most positive manner fulfilled thus far a prediction uttered two thousand six hundred years ago. Another declaration uttered by the prophet claims our attention. "The sun shall be turned into darkness" "before the great and terrible day of the Lord come." Has this been fulfilled? is the next question. We answer, in the most emphatic sense, it has. There is abundant testimony on this very solemn and interesting point. I shall, however, present but few.

"The Dark day of May 19, 1780.—The sun rose clear, and shone for several hours; at length, the sky became overcast with clouds, and by ten o'clock, A. M. the darkness was such as to occasion the farmers to leave their work in the field, and retire to their dwellings; fowls went to their roosts, and before noon, lights became necessary to the transaction of business within doors. The darkness continued through the day; and the night till near morning was as unusually dark as the day."—Gage's History of Rowley, Mass.

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived: 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment day was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man, for his lamp was trimmed and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude. His nephew, who was then a little child, in after life retained a lively recollection of that scene, and his childish feelings are an interesting exhibition of the manner in which Mr. Lee was regarded, for he felt not the least alarm in his presence, thinking that he was perfectly safe where his good uncle was, even if the day of judgment had come."—Tract No. 379 of Am. Tract Society.—Life of Edward Lee of Mass.

Having seen a most perfect fulfillment thus far, we shall in the next place proceed to show that the last sign enumerated by the prophet as the unerring precursor of the GREAT DAY OF GOD'S WRATH, has been witnessed. And in view of this solemn fact I am often compelled to exclaim, O how unbelieving is the great mass, and how few in reality believe the word of God! "The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood."

The following article was published in the "Philadelphia Inquirer," and dated Fort Leavenworth, Mi., March 20, 1843:—

"On the 14th of Feb. we had the most remarkable phenomena here that I ever heard of, except the falling stars. At three A. M. the moon, which had been obscured by a cloud for some hours, burst forth, of a DEEP BLOOD-RED COLOR, with a black cross of equal proportions over the face, but not extending beyond the rim; while on the two sides, small pieces of a rainbow were visible. After continuing in this way for about an hour, the color of the moon changed to its ordinary hue, and the cross became a silvery white, with the edges extending beyond the rim, and touched the rainbow."

The following is from the "Missionary Herald" of June, 1842, p. 234. It is an account of an earthquake at that place in 1822. He says:—

"On the night of the earthquake there was something peculiar in the atmosphere, the moon appearing red as blood. This greatly alarmed the inhabitants, who were continually crying out 'Now we shall hear the trumpet sound! and the dead will rise! the day of judgment has arrived!'"

Thus has the Almighty in his abounding mercy been pleased to write the history of these great and wonderful signs in the heavens over two thousand years in advance, as the evidences of the last days, in order to test the faith of the judgment generation, which I most solemnly and unhesitatingly believe the present to be. Truly these are the last, the very last days; all the signs that uncreated benevolence promised, as so many godly admonitions, to stir and encourage his saints to diligence in order to be ready and waiting for his appearing, have been fulfilled. We are now rushing into the last jot of prophecy that the adorable Redeemer declared should clearly distinguish the closing moments of time. We have had signs in the sun, moon and stars, and now, lo and behold, "distress of nations and perplexity."

"Lift your heads, ye friends of Jesus!
Partners in his patience here;
Christ to all believers precious—
Lord of lords will soon appear;
Mark the tokens of his heavenly kingdom near."

Truly the shadows of the evening are stretched out. Amen. Even so come, Lord Jesus.

We bespeak for the following the prayerful attention of our readers. It is time we give more attention to the subject of "holiness, without which no man can see the Lord." The Bride must make herself ready: and in order to this must be found without spot, and blameless. We hope Bro. D. and other of our contributors will favor us with more upon this important subject. For the Crisis.

To those who Hunger and Thirst after Righteousness.

When the children of God are convinced of the need of sanctifying grace, and to this end have a clear sight of their remaining inbred corruptions, Satan frequently tempts them to believe they have never known God's justifying grace. He tells them so much impurity of heart cannot consist with the divine favor. But remember, he makes known what is wrong in the heart, as you are able to bear it, that you may fly to that blood for cleansing which can make the foulest clean. Let this conviction be improved, that by faith you may lay hold on the promise, which offers a fulness to all who hunger and thirst after righteousness.

The people of God under their afflictions are often tempted to an impatience to be freed. But they should wait calmly for the time God has appointed for their deliverance. It is of more importance to you to have grace properly to bear and improve your afflictions, than to be entirely delivered from them. To be supported under them, may so sanctify as to render them the greatest blessing. But if, according to your own desire, you could break away from them, it might prove your ruin. God sees it needful for his people to be tried, and why should you complain? Satan may suggest, if you could see the end of these afflictions, and how they were to terminate for your good, you would have no cause of complaint or anxiety; but, as they are now circumstanced, you have real cause for both. But it will be well to consider that one of the brightest excellencies of the christian faith is to confide in God in the darkest hour of affliction, with an assurance that, in so doing, he will conduct your affairs for his own glory and your good. If the event and all connected circumstances were known, there would be little or no trial of your faith; and to grow uneasy because of it, is to wish your faith might never be put to the trial.

Had Abraham known God would have released his son, and accepted for a sacrifice a ram which his tender faithfulness had provided, what he did could have been no great trial of his faith. But when he is seen going forward in obedience to the command, although he could see no way for God to accomplish his promise, it can be no subject of wonder to hear the apostle say, "he did not stagger at the promise, through faith giving glory to God."

Had Daniel certainly known God would have stopped the mouths of the lions, or the three worthies that he would have quenched the violence of the fire, a very small degree of faith and christian fortitude would have been sufficient for their support. But, as they were ignorant of the method he would take to glorify himself, and save them, and as they calmly confided in him, though thick clouds and darkness rested on the event, there was something in their faith and conduct worthy of imitation. And many like instances might be found where the people of God have trusted him in the darkest hour, and have been gloriously delivered.

To be impatient of deliverance before the time God appoints, or to wish it in any other way than his wisdom directs, is in effect to wish God may not be glorified, or our own souls benefitted. Against this we have need to watch and pray, and in all trials look earnestly to God for supporting grace, and leave the time and manner of deliverance entirely with him; by so doing, we may find our trials so sanctified as to further us in the way of holiness; casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you. Be sober, be vigilant, and humble yourselves under his mighty hand, and he will fill and exalt you in due time, for he hath called us unto his eternal glory, and, after we have suffered a while, he will make us perfect, and will establish, and strengthen, and settle us. To him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

The Glorious Keeping.

"Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

A place of safety in times of danger has been the inherent desire of human beings since the world began. Adam, the great prototype of mankind, when conscious of his guilt in disobeying the law of God, sought at once to hide himself from the searching glance of the Being he had offended. But no place of safety was afforded; his flimsy covering of fig leaves and temporary hiding place could not secure him from the piercing eye of the God that made him. Hence he was bidden to come forth, and endure the scrutiny of Him who can by no means uphold the guilty, or look upon sin with the least degree of allowance. Thus it has ever been in all ages of the world with sin and sinners,—seeking a temporary place of safety to hide them from their guilt and its attendant consequences; and thus will it be until the heavens shall depart "as a scroll, when it is rolled together," and "every mountain and island" be "moved out of their places;" and the wicked of every grade and name, "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men," shall "hide themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains," saying to the "mountains and rocks fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" This will be the language of the finally impenitent; but their outer darkness, their wailings and gnashing of teeth must be endured, while nought but a "fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation" will devour all adversaries who are found without life and immortality, as brought to light through the gospel.

While this is the fearful doom of the wicked, thanks be to God for his "unspeakable gift." The righteous, those who by patient continuance in well doing have sought for glory and eternal life, through the blood of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, will not be disappointed. Jesus, the Mediator, to whom they have given their hearts in a life-time obedience, has become their surety, paid their debt, and accomplished their ransom; and now, in the hour of their need, all along their earthly journey, stands forth for their deliverance, affording them the blest assurance that no weapon formed against them shall prosper, but out of every danger and temptation there shall be made a way of escape. This is the abiding inheritance of every true child of God. The precious promises are all his own, not one of which will fail him in his time of need.

But this is not all his consolation, enjoying the life that now is; there is a day of trouble at hand, a death struggle, which each must know for himself and not another, a day of judgment, of separation of the righteous from the wicked. Then appears the glorious keeping, the precious hiding place, the sure retreat from the gathering storm, "the munition of rocks," the tower of safety to all those who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. Hear the blessed Savior saying, "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." And to the christians of these days, in which we live, has not the trial hour, the day of temptation, almost or quite come? Our beloved country is convulsed with war, brother rising against brother, while pride and oppression stalk boldly forth, and equity and justice seem fallen in our streets. And because of this iniquity abounding, the love of many has waxed cold; only here and there we note the pure and true representatives of the meek and lowly Jesus.

O! as christians, shall we not more than ever examine ourselves, to know whether we be in the faith or not? Shall we not trim our lamps afresh, that they brightly burn amid the moral darkness that surrounds us, and examine our purposes of holiness, our decision of religious character, if so be they shall stand the jostlings of this time-serving age; or, be ready with our loins girt about, should our Lord come at the first, second, or third watch? The day approaches that "shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." But those whose trust is in the name of the Lord, will be numbered among his jewels, acknowledged and accepted at the marriage supper of the Lamb. M. A. T.

For the Crisis.

Will.

In every phase of life, there are found loose, roving notions of selfish aggrandizement. The growth of moral discipline may do much to check the outbursting of this innate principle, but there is no cause to brand this effect with an universal curse.

The man of business habits, whose life is made up of change and circumstance, prosecutes a plan that is peculiar to the notions and proclivities which are the groundwork of success. He never feels disposed to concede the impracticability of any purpose, for the reason, that he never guages causes by results. The merit or demerit involved is not so much a matter of consequence, as the aggrandisement resulting from its completion. It is worth something to be satisfied,—to have gained a moral victory over moral discouragements; and if not one jot or tittle of substantial emolument is secured to fill the vacuum of delinquencies, he is quite refreshed to know that he has satisfied himself, at least, of his power of endurance.

But it is not easily proved that this seeming inconsistency, when rightly executed, is not productive of good. There are enough who are ready to stamp sin upon the face of all intelligence that does not comport favorably with their notions of holiness; but how many of the religious world dare assume the responsibility of compiling a category of actual sins, and with their budget of demerit, prescribe a cure in vindication of the character of God? It may be he loves the Lord with all his heart, soul, might, mind and strength; but it is very doubtful whether, through this relation, he becomes proficient in the doctrine of abstract evil. In the absence of a defence, an argument assumes wondrous proportions. A man who undertakes to filter the doctrine of human depravity through a strata of dogmatical views, has succeeded only in his own estimation. The thunders of Demosthenes rolled at a distance from Philip and his hosts; and Tully poured forth his fiercest torrent of vindictive when Cataline was at a distance and his dagger no longer to be feared.

Saith God, "I make peace and create evil." Why, in the divine economy, may not the fact (not the theory) of human depravity be compatible with and accessory to the highest good? When God says to a benighted heart, "Let there be light," notwithstanding the cold, embryotic shadow that for the age enshrouded it has vanished before the light of God,—does the transfer clandestinely rob the favored one of an element which through unshackled freedom springs forth to praise the Lord? Never. The same inveterate will which fashioned him a minion of slavish passion, now, with new-born energy leads him to undertake the noblest task of God. To social life he becomes of priceless worth, and, in the warfare of life's elements, a giant conqueror under heaven's Chieftain.

Because some men may fail of obtaining eternal life, it is a gross imputation to assume that God either drew an unequivocal line between moral character and the mercy of Christ, or that his own grace was inefficient in exercising control over the human passions; for the reason, He never yet required men to become morally purified, and then become spiritually perfected. "Give me thine heart" is the requisition; become like little children. Whoever heard of children becoming morally purified? By implication, they are no less naturally depraved than the man of years; the germ of unholiness ripens with increasing age, and yet God says, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." He saves such. In the economy of HIM, hereditary evil procured for lost men a plan of redemption sufficiently inherent with saving grace to comprehend in its capacity all men; but in the absence of such redemption, the theory of Adamic evil would hardly support the language of Jesus. The transfer of the affections from actual sin to the government of Christ, does not exclude us from the blighting taint of the "Serpent's" trail; for it is "appointed unto men once to die"—the natural result of sin—a declension from a developing process towards immortality to a corruptible dissolving condition. The transfer, or change of mind, may not imply loss of ambition. "Repent"—change your mind—"and be converted." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Not repent of human nature. Nicodemus' incredulity concerning being "born again," left Christ to explain to him a plan of regeneration, operating only through sympathy between him and God; while the contumacious thief lost no atom of intellectual vigor through the sudden transition of a despairing suppliant.

But, finally, does an individual, through a lack of elements requisite to a finished vocalist, become less susceptible of moral worth? Or because men's inherent passions incite them to deeds of darkness, does condition forever alienate them from the life and power of God? That malicious victim of unbridled passion, "Saul of Tarsus," was led through the power of Christ to defend and prosecute his work with the same indomitable, unwavering will with which he persecuted the saints of God. It was the foolish things of this world confounding the wise, and the weak things of this world confounding the mighty. It was making the wrath of man to praise God. In his physical, as well as his moral government, his creative power adapts the mind for each separate task assigned it. He of lofty intellect, expansive genius, and creative imagination, inherited the elements as his birthright. They grow with his growth, and strengthen with his strength; and however much the contaminating hoof of sin may have warped and cramped his moral life, he is noble still; for he holds his greatest worth subservient to the will of his Maker; and, through a conformation to His government, he becomes the Pharos of the world. It is the mystical acquaintance with the Judge of Heaven that adjusts and guides the living, acting will of man, and crumbles into dust the broken reed that so long impierced the trusted side. Let him that possesses an iron will, bewail no longer the exhausting struggle that makes his life a battle-field, for God's own beneficent hand wrought the undeveloped plan that may ultimately result in a growth of heavenly excellence, when he shall take his place in the centre of the crown that canopies o'er him, and hears the gracious words, blushing with tints of love, "Fear not, my saints." To You.

Yes, whoever reads this, if converted or not, may read, "To you" especially; I am speaking to you. I am sitting before an open door. All around me I see the beautiful works of our Creator. Do I not hear a voice from them? "The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away; but the word of the Lord endureth forever." "All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass." Here are two of the many thoughts suggested to my mind; and here is one I wish to present to your mind, most seriously. Do you think God made all these beauties of nature for a higher and more exalted object than the satisfaction of our appetites, or the gratification of our love of these beauties? You say "yes" in your heart, for who will acknowledge he has no higher order of intellect than this would require. Will not the Giver of this intellect and appreciation require that you improve your talent, and profit by these lessons which are before you constantly? Have you not seen, day after day, a constant change in nature; her works fading away until the forest was bare and drear; the ground covered with snow, and no vestige of the earth's beautiful dress remaining? Have you not seen her in the spring, again arrayed in her robe of green, while the birds warbled their songs of praise, the lambs skipped and played, and the cattle were grazing on her thousand hills? What did you learn from this? God's holy word, which shall judge you at the last day, says, "Where much is given, much will be required"; leaving you to trace the analogy between this and your own life, all but the last lesson. This change happeneth to all nature's works.

You know how summer is fast passing away, your harvest nearly ended; you must soon put off your summer dress. I pause—for here you must think. Your winter, like the plants, will be dark and drear. Think again—will you ever come forth in a spring dress, a robe of righteousness? Ah! I am talking to you now. Will you ever come forth from your dark winter, called by the Son of righteousness, (who will restore this groaning earth to its Eden state,) to receive the fine linen which is to be the dress of the saints? If you have never been converted, I warn you, in the name of my Master, to flee the wrath to come; flee to Christ, who died for you, that through him you might have eternal life. You have had christian parents, from whose lips has often ascended a prayer, that a "prodigal son" might return. You have often knelt by that mother, heard her earnest entreaties that you might be plucked, a brand out of the fire. Has her prayer been answered? Why? You were not willing. The result is, you are lost, without you flee to Christ. I am talking to you. You have resisted these gracious influences so long, I fear the door will soon be shut to you. You say your parents never prayed with you. Have you not heard Christ, when you read the prayer he offered up while agonizing in the garden, "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also who shall believe on me, through their word." Here is a prayer from a brother, if you believe. Where are you? Out of Christ; alas! your only hope.

How was it with the antediluvians? They were out of the ark; were they saved? No. Oft repeated invitations were slighted; oft was the "preacher of righteousness" disregarded, just as you have done many times; but when Noah went in at the appointed time, the door was shut. Are you in Christ? To you I am speaking, while the door is open. How did you get in? by the door, or some other way? David said, "Open me the gates of righteousness, that I may go in to them." Listen to Christ—"I am the door; by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved. I am the good shepherd, and have given my life for the sheep." "The God of peace has brought from the dead that good shepherd, that through him you might have life." How, and when, did you get into Christ? Ask yourself this question seriously and solemnly. Are there no doubtings, no misgivings? "He that climbeth up some other way is a thief and a robber." No one but yourself can answer; for you have this assurance, "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God"; and it is only in Christ we can be accepted. I am talking plainly; but Paul says, "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? . . . For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, (is'nt this strong language he uses?) we shall be in the likeness of his resurrection." You never thought about it! Now I will ask you, who said, "Search the Scriptures"? And have you obeyed? Do you imagine none but the "eight souls" thought they should be saved? I have no doubt many thought there was "time enough"; they could stay on the outside, or climb up some other way, than to go into an open door. Did they? No, the door was shut. That ark was a type of Christ, and not of the church. This is the Lamb's wife—the body, not the Head. Peter says, "eight souls were saved by water; the like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ." Leave out the sentence in brackets, and how does it say we are saved? Paul had the same idea—"planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be in the likeness of his resurrection." O, my friend, whoever you are, may you listen to one who speaks in the name of his Master. O may you take heed; and may this seed fall into good and honest hearts, which shall bear fruit abundantly; remembering there is an enemy who will sow tares among the wheat, which will be allowed to grow until the harvest. Flee to the ark of safety.

Behold the ark of God,
Behold the open door;
Haste to that blest abode,
And rove, my soul, no more.
There safe shalt thou abide,
There sweet shall be thy rest,
All longings satisfied—
With full salvation blest.

Again the earth shall [illegible],
We'll ride the sea of fire,

The Free Pottage.

We read that in old times the prophet Elisha came to Gilgal, in a period of great scarcity, and finding the sons of the prophets there, it would seem in a kind of academy, and rather short of provisions, he ordered his servant to set on the great kettle and make soup, or pottage, so that they all could be fed. This of course was very kind in him, and all were interested in it. So each, it seems, brought what they could, meat, herbs, and vegetables, to make it nourishing and savory. By and by, some one, probably a novice in such matters, found in the field a vine of wild gourds, probably the colo-quintada, or bitter apple. Thinking that he had made a great discovery, he brought a lap full of them to the kettle, and began to slice them in. Of course he supposed them good food, and perhaps thought that no soup was complete without them. I do not know that any one objected to what he was doing, and if they did, could not he say, "Is'nt this a free kettle? Is'nt this a free pottage? [illegible] May not all put in what they like? Do you deny my right to put in what I please? I have got the best I can find; I think it is good; and you have got to let it go into the pot, or else we will have a free kettle, we will buy a new ladle, and a new dish; take out all the bones we have put into your soup, build a new fire and have an opposition pottage, and then when you skim your watery broth, we think you will wish you had been a little more neighborly."

Of course there is no way to answer such arguments as these; and the poor cook, not wishing to have a fuss, and fearing to have an opposition kettle started, would perhaps let him do as he liked. At least, in some way, the gourds all got sliced up and put in, and stirred around, whether by inadvertence or by consent. Well, the pottage boiled and bubbled, and was stirred and watched to keep it from burning, until it was pronounced done, and then the hungry boys and students gathered around with their spoons and dishes, and it was laded out to them, and they sat down all in peace and unity, all in charity and love, to eat the prophet's pottage, so grateful to them in a time of dearth. But it tasted strangely! "Gall of bitterness!" says one, "what's the matter with the pottage?" "And it came to pass as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out and said, O thou man of God, THERE IS DEATH IN THE POT!!"

So much for the free pottage kettle, into which some inexperienced son of the prophets in his ignorant zeal had sliced a lap full of wild gourds, thereby spoiling the pottage and periling the lives of the whole company. And yet, if his gourds had been rejected, he might have said, "Is not this a free kettle?" and would have talked long of freedom, liberality and charity.

The result may warn us not to "go and do likewise"; nor could we, even for freedom's sake, safely allow such license, unless we were sure of having Elisha present to stir in a handful of meal and cure the poison, so there should be no harm in the pot. Each son of the prophets may perhaps pick, slice, stew and eat wild gourds on his own account; but is it safe to put them all into the big kettle? At least the prudent way, illiberal and popish as it may be called, seems to be, to have some one who has experience in making pottage, watch the pot till the pottage is done, and admit no man's lapful of gourds until he knows them to be wholesome food. Better leave out some good food even, than to let everything in, and so hear the wail coming up on every hand, "O thou man of God, there is death in the pot." Let each man cook his gourds in his own dish, and save us from mixing up matters that may prove deadly. May God give us wholesome pottage, is my prayer; and if any body does put wild gourds into it, even by mistake or through ignorance, O for a prophet who can stir in meal as soon as possible! H. L. The World's Crisis.

BRO. GRANT:—Being present at the Worcester meeting, I thought at one time that the Crisis had indeed come to a crisis; but it nobly outbraved the storm, and it is to be hoped that a long calm will ensue. It appears to me now dearer than ever. The occupation of two whole days in discussing the business of a weekly paper, indicates that there is something of importance at issue. A barren tree attracts no attention, but one laden with delicious fruit sometimes causes considerable strife. The press is a mighty engine for good or evil. Next to the sword, is its power felt in civil and political strife, and next to the written word of God and the preaching thereof, is its influence in the dissemination of religious truth. How important then that those who have the management of this mighty engine should realize the power put into their hands, and understand how to guide it to a successful issue.

As to the editorship of the Crisis, it appears to me there is about as much responsibility resting upon its contributors, as upon its editors, if it is to be a medium for every subject any one wishes to agitate. I don't believe the Crisis, or any other religious paper, should be like a public market, every one bringing just what kind of provision he pleases; neither should it be so exclusive as to prohibit the examination of the prominent truths of the Bible. But when any particular subject is made a bone of contention and almost a test of fellowship, it would be better to keep it entirely out of the columns of any family paper. As the Crisis is a family paper, and we want to extend its circulation, whatever goes into its columns ought to be well sifted first. We should have some scruples in sending it to any one who had never seen it, if we knew it contained sentiments and doctrines we had not digested, and of the truth of which we were in doubt. I think an editor should have discretionary powers in the selection of matter for publication, and the church ought to confide in his judgment. But amidst all our discussion and doctrines, the most important one is, the love of God shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost, without which, all other things will be of no avail in the great reckoning day. May the Crisis, and its readers, and all connected with it, have a prosperous voyage.

AND

SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, Nov. 13, 1861.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

HEREAFTER ALL LETTERS, COMMUNICATIONS, REMITTANCES AND ORDERS FOR THE WORLD'S CRISIS ARE TO BE DIRECTED TO ELDER MILES GRANT, BOSTON, MASS.

H. L. HASTINGS, President C. P. S.

Jesus is Coming.

There is no news so cheering to the true christian, as to hear that "Jesus is coming." Hence, when the evidences of the speedy coming of Christ were presented by Bro. Miller and other devoted men, it caused great joy to those who had been living to the glory of God, and thorough heart-searching among the lukewarm, whose affections had been partly upon the world. We can now look back with pleasure upon those days, and exclaim with the apostle, "What carefulness it wrought in you; yea, what indignation; yea, what fear; yea, what vehement desire; yea, what zeal."

Many are witnesses to the truth of the saying of the apostle John, when he is moved to write, "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." There is no doctrine, we think, better calculated to keep the church of Christ in a healthy condition, than a belief in his speedy, personal coming. Certainly, this is a very practical truth when we are near the event, as all things now indicate. And as certain as it is a practical truth for the times, it will follow that they, who neglect to inform and interest themselves in this all important subject, will not purify themselves, and live as devotedly as they would did they give it proper attention. They will lack stimulus in the right direction; will be inclined to be indifferent in the great work of striving to save men; live carelessly, become worldly minded, be "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." If the speedy, and personal advent of our Savior is a truth for the times, then it will follow that those churches, which do not countenance preaching on this subject, other things being equal, will not be as spiritual, and active in the vineyard of the Lord, and hence not as well prepared for the event as those which give heed to the proclamation, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh."

From careful observation during several years, we are fully satisfied that the evidences of the speedy coming of Christ are now standing forth with such brightness, that no church, or individual, can neglect them with safety.

As soon as this great truth is neglected, or put in the background, this present world is sure to take the foreground, the heart is filled with love for it, and darkness with doubts fill the mind; the glory of the coming kindgom fades away before the vision, and passing events absorb the individual's best thoughts, and secure his most earnest efforts. We have yet to become acquainted with a single individual, who has seen the evidences of the near advent of Christ, and refused to give them attention, or having been once interested and turned away from them to please friends, or from any other motive, who made any observable progress in divine life. On the other hand, those who have embraced the doctrine of the speedy advent of our Savior, and stood up boldly in its defence, have been quickened in the discharge of their duties, and consequently have received a clearer evidence of their acceptance, while they rejoice in the promise that there is "a crown of righteousness" "laid up for . . . all . . . that love his appearing."

We have yet to be convinced that a christian ever lived who did not love the appearing of Jesus. Indeed, we do not see how it is possible that it should be otherwise. The opposite idea bears absurdity upon its very face. We are ever delighted to hear that absent friends, whom we love, are coming to see us; but the christian has no friend so dear to him as Jesus; hence he is more anxious to see him than every one else. The reason why people do not love the appearing of the Savior is because they are not living right. They are not in harmony with him. They do not keep his commandments,—they are not his friends. All true christians have feelings in harmony with John, who, when he heard the angel say, "He which testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly; Amen," exclaimed, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." And, if the reader cannot say the same, so far as his own case is concerned, it must be for the reason that he is not doing his whole duty. Such should reform at once lest it be forever too late.

He who truly loves the appearing of Jesus, knows what it is to have a "blessed hope." Such an one has comfort and peace to which the worldling is an entire stranger. All such will be delighted with the evidences which show that "the end of all things is at hand." We purpose to do what we can to comfort these dear pilgrims, and to urge them on their way, while engaged in contending against the wiles of Satan in these "last days." Now is the time to stand firm, "unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

If troubles come, if friends forsake, foes prevail, and all things earthly fade away, then smile and sing—

"Jesus soon is coming,
This is my song;
Cheers the heart when joys depart,
And foes are pressing strong."

Our Western Visit.

In compliance with many earnest requests, we resume our notes of travel. Since May 1st, we have traveled over four thousand miles, preached one hundred and fifty-nine sermons, had one discussion with a Methodist minister, on the immortality of the soul, and buried thirty in baptism. The Lord has blessed his servant with sweet peace and joy in the Holy Spirit, and a very bright assurance of a home in the coming kingdom, with all the dear saints of God. We can say in truth, there is no service so delightful as that which the christian religion enjoins.

We pass over our very interesting meetings in Danville, Melbourne, Knowlton Falls, Stanbridge and Waterloo, in Canada East, by simply remarking, that the Lord most signally blessed the people, and removed the load of sin from many burdened hearts, and filled them with joy in believing. We have rarely had better meetings than at Danville. Our delightful visit at Bro. John Porter's in D. is among the rich memories of the past. Bro. P. is the pastor of the congregation at D. When we left, we knew of no church in a more healthy condition than that one. Our grove meetings at Stanbridge and Knowlton Falls were deeply interesting. The people were anxious to hear and know the truth. At Waterloo, we had very pleasant interviews with Dr. Hutchinson, who is wearing out a feeble constitution in well-doing. They are building a new meeting house in W., to be done by Jan. 1st, 1862.

But we were to say a few words of our western tour. At the close of our excellent campmeeting at Wilbraham, we visited Poultney to see our dear Bro. Howell, who was nigh unto death; fearing, unless we took that opportunity, we should not have another. While in P. it was our privilege to meet with the brethren and sisters for the worship of God, and listen again to their heart-cheering testimonies. Although much saddened at the sickness of their beloved pastor, they were joyful in the hope of soon meeting him in the land where "the inhabitant shall not say I am sick."

We had very pleasant visits at Castleton, and Sandy Hill, with those whom we love in the Lord. Bro. A. Ross, the faithful pastor at C., was about closing his labors there, for the purpose of traveling as an evangelist. He is awake to the signs of the times, and is anxious to do what he can to arouse the sleeping multitudes, and urge them to prepare for the great day of the Lord.

We found the congregation at Sandy Hill doing well under the faithful labors of Bro. Mathewson, and anxiously waiting for the return of the Son of man.

When in Rochester, we called on Bro. P. A. Smith, and found him, as usual, alive in the work of God. We feel confident he will not be found sleeping at his post when his Master appears.

Our next stopping place was at Dansville, N. Y. Here we had an earnest battle with the enemy, and the Lord gave us a glorious victory. Six were baptized, and several others, we learn, are ready to follow their example. We found this a hard soil to cultivate, but the seed finally took effect, after the enemies of the cross began to manifest their opposition openly. The prospect in Dansville is good.

While there, it was our privilege to visit "Our Home" on the hillside, and listen to several interesting and profitable lectures from Dr. J. C. Jackson, who, with his associates, is having great success in healing the sick, and yet does not give one particle of medicine. It is marvelous to witness the happy results of his mode of treating the various diseases common to man. We are acquainted with no health institution, which we think equal to this.

On our return from N. Y., we visited Albany, where we found a faithful company making earnest efforts to be ready to meet our coming Lord.

We also spent a Sabbath very pleasantly at Castleton, Vt., and found a large number who are pressing "toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." We shall expect to see a goodly representation from that place, in the kingdom of God.

From C. we went in company with Bro. D. T. Taylor and others to the Worcester Convention, the report of which has already been given through the Crisis.

In conclusion, we would say, to the glory of God, that our hope is bright, peace like a river, with strong faith in the doctrine that the Lord of glory will soon appear. G.

QUOTING SCRIPTURE.—When any of our contributors have occasion to quote passages of Scripture, we wish they would take the trouble to turn to the Bible and write it word for word just as it reads. If they will be so kind as to do this, it will save us much labor and perplexity. If we had abundance of time to spare for the purpose of looking out all the quotations, we would not complain; but as we are hurried and drove almost beyond endurance, we wish our contributors to favor us all they can in preparing their copy, and we will endeavor to improve each moment, saved in this direction, to good account in the discharge of other editorial duties. Please remember the foregoing suggestion, and much oblige your servants, G. & M.

The Great Naval Expedition.

The largest naval expedition that ever floated in American waters sailed from Hampton Roads on the 29th ult. Its precise point of destination has not been made public, through fear that its object might be defeated. It has been fitted out for the purpose of strengthening the southern blockade, taking the rebel forts, and the conquest of the seaport towns and cities. Stirring news is daily expected from this fleet. It has taken along a land, as well as a naval force, so as to make conquests both by sea and land. The naval portion is commanded by Commodore Samuel F. Dupont, and the military by Gen. Thomas W. Sherman. The squadron is said to number over seventy vessels, including some of the largest in our commercial and naval service. The fleet carries about five hundred guns, and the land force consists of about twenty thousand men.

It is reported that the troops on board the fleet have been landed at Beaufort, S. C., about fifty miles W. S. W. from Charleston; and that the naval force had commenced the bombardment of Port Royal. G.

John 21: 25.

Bro. C. W., of Southington, Ct., wishes to know the meaning of John 21: 25, which reads as follows:—"And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written. Amen."

Wakefield renders the latter part of this verse as follows: "I do not think that the world even then would receive the books which should be written." Thompson renders the same in the following language:—"Even then I do not think that the world would cordially receive the books written." This is evidently the meaning of the passage. G.

The Late Storm.

The great storm of Nov. 2d and 3d was one of the most severe ever known upon our coasts. A large number of lives were lost, and a great amount of property destroyed.

A correspondent at Nahant says:—"The storm of Saturday night was the most severe ever known, (excepting, perhaps, the Minot gale in 1851,) with very high tides, which swept across the Nahant and Lynn beaches, doing considerable damage to roads," &c. The Portland papers state that the tide rose higher than has been known for thirty-one years, submerging nearly all the wharves, and filling the cellars of stores on Commercial street, causing great damage to property. "The Coming Man."

Bro. I. K. Lombard wishes the brethren to give him all the information relative to the "Coming Man," as believed in and expected by the Spiritualists. He says:—

"If any one has any testimonies on the 'coming Man,' or false Christ, as looked for by the Spiritualists, and published by them; and on their proposed coming distribution of land, published by them, they will be thankfully received, and the donors remembered when the 'Coming Struggle' shall come out in pamphlet form. I hope to get it published soon, with a fuller expression of their plans on these two points. Those who send will please give the authority, and forward to I. K. Lombard, Livermore, Me. A plan for aid in publishing will be forwarded to the Crisis soon." G.

A REQUEST.—If any brother should be traveling over the Jackson Branch R. R. the coming winter, he is requested to call on A. B. Fabrick, Clinton, Seneca Co., Mich. G.

BRO. S. D. DANIELS wishes to say to those who gave him information on Dan. 12: 2, that he is very thankful for the great favor conferred. G.

Our Past and Present briefly Reviewed.

Eighteen years have wrought marvellous changes in the condition and prospect of our cause in this country. To find a precedent that would at all compare with our history for that length of time in all the pages of modern denominationalism, would probably be impossible. Never was there a cause, since the days of the apostles, whose adherents were more thoroughly girded and stimulated by the truths of revelation than have been the people who in this country have for the last twenty years been looking for the return of the Lord. No people have been more intelligently and immovably settled in their religious belief. And yet, strange as it may appear, until within a few years it remained a problem whether we were a people or not. So many were the divisions, and party cliques, and strange messages that agitated, and often shook to the very centre the body—as by a moral earthquake; together with a strange indifference on the part of the people as to anything like wholesome discipline or the most simple Bible order, that for many years it was wholly problematical, with many of our best minds, whether any thing could come out of such a mass of incongruities that would be for the glory of God, or the honor of any man to be associated with.

On the one part were able leaders, whom envy declared maintained their position but for the love of championship; while a christian charity could believe it was maintained for nothing else in the world but a christian devotion to the truth. However that may be, it is certain that by error of judgment, or what is perhaps more probable, by yielding principle to human expediency, they found it their pleasure to upon every possible opportunity decry against any thing and every thing in the shape of consistent system, or Bible order. The cry was, "Away with creeds," "Iron bed-steads," "Legislation in faith," "It is too late,"—as if things could not be done "decently and in order," because the Lord was at hand. And last, and most unworthy of all, was the shameful plea—"The people wont bear it"; as if God and principle were all left out of the question; as if they were the humble servants of the people, and not the advocates of divine principles—principles ordained in heaven, which must be contended for whether there were any people willing or not. It is perhaps not uncharitable to believe that in these expressions they made defence of their own predilections, rather than those of the people.

On the other hand, able men, who could not contend—or, if they could, were only a little later severed from the body,—felt it their duty to either return to their former communions, or to maintain a separate position. Indeed so extensively did this feeling prevail, that it is doubtful if there is to be found a man of respectable talents amongst us, who has not at times seriously questioned whether it was not his duty to change his communion.

But to-day, the aspect of our cause with reference to these things has very essentially changed. Where once we had the most bitter partisan spirit, we now have unity. Not that all see alike as to measures, yet such are the desires for union in the body, that a temporary compromise is deemed better than a division of the living body. Where once there were many strange and conflicting messages, we are with a rather remarkable unanimity beginning to learn to speak the same thing. And where formerly there was no order and no system, now God's host is marshaled, and its power felt.

With reference to the matter of order, we believe, for ourselves, the nearer we approximate the New Testament arrangement the more acceptable will be our labors before God. But governments are among the gifts of God, and we hail anything that comes of this line to be preferable to anarchy, for anarchy savors of Babylon. It may even have some admixtures of human weakness adhering to it; still it is better than nothing. If a man cannot have a ceiled house to abide in, let him have a tent, or the next best thing he can get. "A half a loaf is better than none." It is with such a view we hail with unmingled joy the advance our churches have made in this direction within a few years past. From the most easterly ocean-lashed strand of Maine, to far beyond the waters of the Mississippi, there has been a universal and almost simultaneous uprising of the people and clergy in favor of system and order. The result has been, churches have been set in order, (as far as could be); Conferences, annual and quarterly, have been organized; and now, (as see in the few last issues of the Crisis,) what cheering reports come to us from Maine, and from Minnesota, of the progress of our precious cause!—a progress of which we could never boast had we never come into order.

A Conference is, properly speaking, the the meeting together of persons to confer or consult together on some subject. But the gatherings that had come under this head for years, were not worthy of so dignified a title; for in many instances there was no conferring together at all. The most they could claim was the character of religious re-unions, or, general or protracted meetings; or if we might borrow a political phrase we might say, they were "mass meetings." But now Conferences have been organized worthy the name conference, and the cause they represent. A simple constitution has been adopted setting forth the object of the conference and the manner in which the object is to be sought. And we hesitate not to venture the affirmation that in no instance does the legislating in matters of faith and doctrine enter in as a part of the design of these conferences. They are chiefly, if not solely, to devise "ways and means" for the advancement of the cause. This is done by hearing reports from churches and the ministerial laborers, and advising with reference to the best plan to obviate difficulties, and promote the well-being of the several churches and ministers within the pale of their local conference. Evangelists are appointed; and thus something is done—in a small way to be sure—to foster a missionary spirit.

Conferences have now been organized in Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, in the western part of Connecticut, in Canada, New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota, that of the last two States being coupled in one. And when we recount these facts, it is with a feeling of triumph, the exquisiteness of which none can know who have not first labored long and hard, amid varied oppositions, for the same end. It is with the belief that the cause to which our dearest life-interest with our best years have been devoted, has made a mighty advance, and that in exactly the right direction. So popular have they now become, that we do not envy the comfort of that man who as a preacher undertakes to maintain a standing among us and yet opposes this move. The day for such men is past. The people have taken the matter in their own hands, and they will no longer submit to the dictum of one individual.

To this may be added the existence of the Advent Christian Association, which, with all its imperfections,—imperfections inseparable to what may be termed hardly more than a state of embryo,—has nevertheless inaugurated a new era in our history. As the result of this organization, we can say, for the first time in our history, "this paper is ours." The Crisis now belongs to all who are minded to constitutionally represent themselves in this Association; and this there are none to dispute.

There are also indications of a more healthful condition of our churches generally. A better appreciation of the pastorate is finding way among them. Not that we would say one word against the noble work of the evangelist—a work to which we have devoted a large share of our ministerial life,—but it is a fact beyond controversy, that no church can have a healthful growth without wholesome pastoral labor. God "gave some evangelists, and some pastors." Chapels and meeting-houses have been built in many directions, until we can now count them by hundreds. A few years ago the pains-taking author of "The Voice of the Church on the reign of Christ" undertook to make out the statistics of our denomination, the conclusion of which was, that there were seventy thousand in America looking for the Lord,—the same conclusion arrived at and published to the world, a few years previous, by Dr. I. E. Jones; but to this was added, by the first named author, that there were six hundred clergymen within the same territory preaching the Lord's advent at hand.

But to cut short this article, we may add, the spirit of universal expectation on the part of the world, and finally, the prospect of speedy translation, make our present position and future prospect most glorious indeed,—a position we may well afford to maintain, at whatever sacrifice or hazards we may be called to make or risk.

"Christian, the morn breaks sweetly o'er thee,
And all thy midnight shadows flee;
Tinged are the distant skies with glory,
A beacon light hangs out for thee."

M.

"Behold He Cometh!"

(Concluded.)

Beloved brother, the Messiah is about to make his second advent to earth! and though you have long waited for him, as you feel, it has been none too long to try your patience or test your loyalty to him. But do you say, "I would give the world could I feel these things as I once did"? But do you not know you are more worldly than you once was? Our Lord knew there was awful danger at this point of our history, and warned us lest at any time our hearts be overcharged with the cares of this life. It is true, we must be diligent in business, and care for our own households; but we do not need to lay up gold and silver for bats and the fires of the last day. In the same ratio the world fills our hearts, the good things of the Kingdom are crowded out. If you would feel as you once did, sacrifice for God as you then did; again unseal your lips and speak for the truth; say to your neighbors, "Behold he cometh!" and back home this testimony with the power of a sober, christian life;—and see if your former joy does not return to you! Make it the subject of your meditations, and the subject of your song.

"Joy, joy, sound it more loudly,
Sing, sing—glory to God;
Soon, soon Jesus is coming,
Publish the tidings abroad."

And again—

"In expectation sweet,
We'll wait, and sing, and pray,
'Till Christ's triumphal car we meet,
And see an endless day."

Enter your closet, and there, while you unbosom your heart to God, pray the heavenly Bridegroom hasten his return to earth. Cry, "How long?" and again, "Come, Lord Jesus," "Thy kingdom come." The subjective influence of such prayers is immensely profitable for our own souls; strengthening our affections for Christ, and giving us a constant and increasingly enlarged apprehension and appreciation of the coming kingdom. But more than all, with such prayers Heaven is well pleased; and they are deposited in the golden vials of God.

Do this, and what was wont to be called the "advent glory" of eighteen or twenty years ago, will be found with all its sweets and glow of love, the same to-day.

"Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." Set yourself one side, where you do not hear the truth preached, and will not be likely to feel its influence to any great extent, and, without a very great fight of faith, you will probably not long care to hear on this subject. But place yourself in the midst of the confessors of the truth, and confess it yourself, not merely once, but upon every becoming occasion, and depend upon it a long time will not be required for you to feel that in just so much as you are obligated to God, you are obligated to let your light shine, and do all you can—be you minister or layman, male or female—to herald the return of the Son of man. The sanctifying and savory effects of the truth you will feel in your heart; while yet upon you rests a burthen, heaven-imposed, that compels you to cry, "Behold he cometh!" You almost instinctively "look up, and lift up your head, for your redemption draweth nigh."

"Know ye that the kingdom of God is nigh." M.

"Fierce."

When Paul was describing the "last days," as recorded in 2 Tim. 3: 1–5, he says men will be "fierce." It is evident that his picture is one of nominal christianity, from the fact, that those described are "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." The ungodly, who have made no profession of religion, have no love for God; hence, not proper to say of them, that they are "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God," neither have they a "form of godliness." It appears perfectly plain, that Paul is writing of professors of religion, who will so far depart from the Lord, as to drink in the spirit of the times which is to characterize the "last days," and when the struggle of the nations comes, they will become "fierce," and unite with the war spirit and movement. The following from the New York Tribune, of Oct. 5th, will give the reader some idea of the perils of these last days:—

A LOUD APPEAL TO YOUNG MINISTERS.

Will you fight for Christ? Fighting must be done—blood must be shed—somebody must stand up for Christ at the cannon's mouth. Providence summons to the gory field, and many must be found who count not their own lives so dear unto themselves as the cause, the suffering cause of Christ. Who of all classes of society should be the first and foremost to present themselves at this altar of bloody sacrifice? In the din of the conflict, going on between Right and Wrong, Heaven and Hell, you have proclaimed that Christ, speaking in the terrible events of these times, was saying to every young able-bodied man, "He that hath no sword let him sell his garment and buy one." Will you not hear him for yourselves? What exemption can you plead to this divine call, so loud and clear that it is distinctly heard outside of your sanctums by many a plain man and woman, long before you can muffle the echo of your own names? What immunity can we urge above the secular professions, that we should be left at home while our peers imperil their lives upon the battle-field, fighting for country and God?

Shall we exhort the young lawyer, doctor, teacher, merchant, mechanic, and farmer to manifest their patriotism and prove their love for the eternal verities of the gospel by taking up carnal weapons, and we shirk the part of danger under the thin cover of superior sanctity or the sacredness of our professions? The question of the Lord, and of the public, too, is, will they fight for Christ? Will we do and dare for our religion? Are we ready to seal with our blood what we have talked in our pulpits? Much as we have said and done to prove our loyalty, we have not yet resisted unto blood striving against sin. Shall we now, at the call of Christ, come out from behind our velvet cushioned barracks, whence we have so often hurled bold, indignant words at the giant iniquity of the age, and meet it face to face with the hot shot of rifled artillery; with the gleaming bayonet, or with clashing sabres in a hand to hand encounter?

I firmly believe you will; and in this faith I offer you the opportunity of gratifying the strongest promptings of your heart—to have a part in the holy war—in this great contest between Christ and Satan now going on. I assume that you know and feel the exigency of the time. Our forces are met at every point by superior numbers of rebels. The emphatic call is for men—for the fighting stock of the Church Militant. Let us respond to this call of Christ and country as becomes men—not by asking for a chaplaincy, but a place in the ranks where the work of Providence is to be done.

I am duly authorized to raise a company of infantry to be afterward mounted, if the service require, for Col. Robert White's regiment of Missouri volunteers; the same to be ready within two weeks from this date. Transportation, subsistence, etc., furnished, to rendezvous at St. Louis. A company of young men from my own congregation and vicinity are in this regiment. The officers and men are all that we could desire. They have already gained distinction in actual service along the borders of "bleeding Kansas."

My young brethren—ministers of the gospel of Jesus Christ, of whatever denomination, of whatever section, east or west—file leaders of humanity, will you shoulder arms and go to the war? I propose a common purse, a common share in the toil and glory.

In the name of your divine Leader, in the name of country, freedom, religion, humanity, and all that you hold dear and sacred, I invoke your co-operation in this effort to aid the cause of Christ, and prove his doctrine all divine.

Report to me at Chicago, Illinois, before the 5th of Oct., box No. 1, 652, or call on Church, Goodman & Kenney, No. 51 LaSalle St., Chicago, same building of the Congregational Herald.

For the Crisis.

A Tract deserving Circulation.

"The Duty of Christians in the Present Crisis." By H. Grattan Guinness, Philadelphia. By the kindness of Bro. T. W. Smith, Philadelphia, I have received the above tract of 24 pages, and have read it with much interest. The duty of christians in the "present crisis" is more fully, candidly, and explicitly stated in this tract than in any thing else of the kind that I have seen for the size. It is written in a spirit which preserves a just medium between trifling with error, and opposing it with bitter severity. I hope it may have a wide circulation as a check to the war spirit.

Correspondence.

From S. Woodruff.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS IN THE LORD:—It has been sometime since I have attempted to speak through the Crisis. I think the times in which we live call us, not only to think and consider, but to act. I believe the church is in a waiting position, and therefore need to exhort each other lest we get into a cold, slumbering state. Many, I fear, have relinquished their hold on God and his kingdom, become tired of waiting, bearing the reproach, and of being separated from friends and the social circle. Can it be possible! Tired of living a holy life! Tired of waiting for our Lord from heaven who is to bring us everlasting life; redeem us from a world lying in sin and iniquity and exalt us to an inheritance that is incorruptible, undefiled, and that will never fade away! O how blessed are they who wait for the Lamb of God; who can say at that day, it is our God, we have waited for him.

Brethren, it seems to me God is calling loudly upon us at this time to examine ourselves, and see whether we be in the faith. The gospel of Christ never will permit you nor me to draw back among those from whom God has called us out in the past, in order to feed us with his truth and prepare us for his eternal glory. Drawing back may seem to suit some of our friends, and they may treat us more kindly for a little time, but saith the Lord, "If any man draw back my soul shall have no pleasure in him." Whereunto we are called, "let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing," and save our souls from perdition.

The world, and its prospect at this time, looks dark and dreary. The great men of earth tremble for fear of what is coming on the earth. War and destruction lie before them. Many are deceiving and being deceived. I would they that profess to love our Lord would heed the words of the Master, where he says, "Come out" from among them O "my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, nor receive "of her plagues." Brethren, having once come out, let us be sure that we keep out; and, by his grace to sustain us, we will wait for the kingdom which will soon come. How blessed it is to have the approbation of God; to have a friend that will never leave nor forsake us; yea, one that sticketh closer than a brother, one that we can look to under all circumstances, who knoweth how to succor us in our afflictions; and as a parent pitieth his children in all their trials and sorrows, so the Lord pitieth them that are his; yea, and more abundantly. I would say to all that read these lines, "Trust in the Lord . . . and verily thou shalt be fed." How blessed are the promises of God.

"And that knowing the time, that now it is high time to wake out of sleep; for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The night is far spent, the day is at hand." Blessed thought, that we are living in a time when the signs and omens tell us plainly our coming King is near; the one whom we have longed to see, the chiefest among ten thousand and the one altogether lovely. Let us not be "led away with the error of the wicked," and "fall from our steadfastness;" but rather let us grow in grace and in the knowledge and wisdom of God. "If we follow on to know the Lord," we shall know that "his going forth is prepared as the morning." O that bright morning, when the King shall appear in his glory, coming down the shining pathway of heaven, admired by all them that believe and love his appearing.

My brethren, let us endure these trials and afflictions that beset us here, knowing they are but momentary. Let the joys and blessings which are eternal, and promised in the future, stimulate us, that we may walk as becometh children of the Lord that are bound for the judgment, and to act wisely "toward them that are without," "redeeming the time." I am satisfied we are almost home. A little in the future, and it will be said, time shall be "no longer;" then he that "is filthy" will "be filthy still." O let us be found righteous, then we shall "be righteous still." Abide in Christ for such will bear fruit to the glory of God.

From J. W. Buckland.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—I have long been wanting to say a few words for the cause of my beloved Master, who has done so much for me; but have been unable to on account of ill health; and now I scarcely feel able. It is nearly a year since I have been permitted to meet with his professed children in the social prayer meeting, and for the last three years I have heard only two sermons, one by Bro. Wendell, which I was not well enough to listen to, the other by Bro. Judson at "Our Home," Dansville. When he undertook to prove that, when God pronounced the sentence of death on Adam, he did not mean life in eternal torments, but a cessation of it, and to my mind it was very conclusively demonstrated, it was truly meat in due season, which I relished as much as a person does when he feels the need of food to supply his physical nature, and obtains it. Therefore, being so feeble, I have to content myself by reading the Crisis and hearing from my brothers and sisters through that, and it really does me good to hear from them, and especially those testimonies under the heading of correspondents, and I hope to hear more from them. For my dear brothers and sisters, who are permitted to meet together often, and speak one to another, know not how to prize the privilege until they are deprived of it. How I long once more to meet in the social prayer meeting, and hear my brothers and sisters talk and sing about something real and tangible concerning which there is no mistake. Yes, praise the Lord, the meek are to inherit the earth, and I feel like pressing onward to that blessed home. God grant I may have grace to endure whatever will be for my good and his glory. I feel that my afflictions have done me good, but still would have them removed. Brothers and sisters in Christ, pray for me, that I may endure all that is necessary for the glory of God, hoping to meet you all in that blessed home, where sickness and sorrow cannot come. Truly yours in hope.

OVERTHROW OF THE NILE.—The unusual rising of the Nile this year appears to have wrought immense damage. Large tracts of grain producing lands have been swept clean of their promised harvests. A Liverpool paper says: "A question of momentous importance is involved in all this—a question which, with the short harvest in France and the general low average crops of European countries, threatens us with that terrible domestic enemy, dear bread. Supposing that the exportation of grain from Alexandria be prohibited, which is highly probable, it would be futile to dilate upon the evil consequences which would inevitably ensue."

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep at Amherst, Me., Oct. 30th, 1861, of consumption, Sr. ELLEN FRANCES, wife of Augustus Rackne, aged 24 years, 1 month, 22 days.

Thus the fell destroyer has entered this family and taken a kind and affectionate wife. Sr. Ellen did not make a public profession of religion, but she met with a change just before she passed away. She expressed a willingness to fall asleep, and at the same time praised the Lord for his goodness and mercy toward her. May the grace of our God comfort and sustain the mourning friends in this deep hour of affliction, and this dispensation of God's providence be sanctified to our good, and his name be glorified.

"All over the land
There's sorrow, sickness and death;
Man's plaintive cries each hour arise,
And thus he yields his breath.
A curse is on the ground,
And a prince in the air;
O! well may we long to be free,
And long for a world that's fair.
Yes, we long for the day
When Satan's reign shall be o'er,
And peace and joy, without alloy,
Be scattered from shore to shore.
Then deserts shall rejoice,
And blossom as Eden fair,
While vine-clad hills and leaping rills
Shall praise to Immanuel bear."

L. WETHERBEE.

Died, in South Albion, Me., Oct. 22, 1861, WILBER FORREST, only child of Jeremiah and Isabel B. Carr, aged 6 years, 3 months, 21 days.

His disease was tumor in the brain, causing much distress for many weeks before death closed his sufferings. For the last two weeks the optic nerve was so affected as to destroy sight.

Wilber was a child remarkable for early and rapid development of intellect, with a strong inclination to learn all he could about the Lord and the world to come. He bore with great patience his severe distress, and often expressed his desire for Jesus to come, but did not want to die. He seemed to understand and happily talk about being "raised up when Jesus comes, to live in a world where he would never die any more."

By this death Bro and Sr. Carr feel deeply afflicted, but God is their portion, and they enjoy much consolation in the blessed hope of Jesus' speedy coming to bring back their dear boy from the land of the enemy, with all the saints. A discourse was preached by the writer, from Jer 31: 15, 16, on the occasion, to a large audience of friends and neighbors who attended the funeral. May the Lord sanctify this affliction to the good of those lonely parents and their relatives, and soon bring us each into the land where death shall not be known

I. C. WELLCOME.

The parents request the following lines published in connection with this notice:—

The lovely flower has faded
That cheered us with its bloom,—
Broken from the parent stem,
It lies in earth's dark tomb.
Gone all its sweetest fragrance,
Crushed are its leaflets bright,—
Faded all its loveliness,
Deep buried from our sight.
But yet again the flower
We nourished with such care,
Will bloom anew in Eden,
By God transplanted there.
'Tis then our eye shall greet it,
Arrayed in fair robes far
Surpassing former beauty,
Our own sweet WILLIE CARR.

M. D. W.

Fell asleep at Rocky Brook, R I, Oct. 28th, CARRIE, youngest child of Bro. George and Sr Mary Ann Eccleston, aged 11 years and 10 months.

Little, laughing, bright-eyed Carrie was a constant attendant of our Sabbath school. She will be missed there, as well as at home around the family board. Little did we think the last Sunday that she came to the Sabbath school that in a little more than a week Carrie would be borne away to the tomb; but so it was to be. Taken down with that fearful disease, diphtheria, she lingered but a few days, and then closed her eyes, to open them no more till she opened them on the immortal shore May God sanctify this affliction to the bereaved parents, brothers and sisters, and also to the children of the Sabbath school. She wanted to die that (as she said) she might be at rest, for while she was sick she suffered very much. During her illness she wished to have them sing to her such hymns as "I have a father in the promised land,"

and

"There is a happy land," etc.,

which seemed to soothe her. Artless Carrie! She will sing, O! how beautiful! when raised from death and corruption to die no more.

"No sickness there;
No weary wasting of the frame away;
No fearful shrinking from the midnight air;
No dread of summer's bright and fervid ray.
Care has no home
Within that realm of ceaseless praise and song;
Its tossing billows break and melt in foam,
Far from the mansions of the spirit throng.
No withered flower,
Or blasted bud, celestial gardens know;
No scorching blast, or fierce descending shower,
Scatters destruction like a ruthless foe.
No hidden grief,
No wild and cheerless vision of despair,
No vain petitions for a swift relief,
No tearful eyes, no broken hearts are there."

C. F. D.

Died, in Wallingford, Ct, Oct. 12th, Bro. GEORGE M. GARRETT, aged 51 years.

Bro. Garrett leaves a wife and three sons to mourn the loss of a most affectionate husband and father. The eldest son was from home at the time of his father's death, having a few weeks previous enlisted as a volunteer, and not supposing his father to be in immediate danger. His mother solicits the prayers of the church in his behalf, and for his safe return.

The church, in the death of our brother, has lost one of its best and most substantial members. He was formerly a member of the Congregational church, but embraced the blessed hope of the speedy advent of the Saviour under the labors of Bro. Grant and Burnham, at Newfield, in this State. This hope cheered him to the end of his life, which was calm and peaceful. Although a great sufferer during his illness, no murmur escaped his lips.

The writer of this notice attended the funeral and endeavored to comfort the afflicted family and friends with the hope of the gospel. May God sustain the bereaved ones in this deep affliction, and bring them, with him, to share eternal life in the morning of the resurrection.

IRA MORGAN.

Died, in East Otis, Oct. 24th, 1861, CAROLINE PHELPS, daughter of Sterling Phelps, aged 24 years.

She leaves four sisters and three brothers, with her parents, and a large circle of connections to mourn her loss. She talked freely with her friends about dying, expressing a willingness to submit to death, if it would be effectual in bringing them to a saving knowledge of Christ. We feel confident that Caroline sleeps in Jesus, and will be raised to immortality and eternal life at his coming. And we pray God to fasten her dying words on the hearts of the surviving parents and children, and incite in them a desire to meet her in the kingdom.

We endeavored to comfort those who attended her funeral with a subject founded on 1 Cor. 15: 54. We trust this opportunity of presenting the truth to a large and attentive audience was not misimproved, and that the result may prove to be for God's glory and the people's good.

FOREIGN NEWS.

(From Liverpool 24th and 26th ult.)

It is the general impression that the recognition of the Kingdom of Italy will be the basis of a reconstruction of the French Cabinet.

It is expected that the Bank of France will almost immediately adopt some new measure to palliate the existing crisis.

There was a vague rumor that France had notified Italy to have its military organization ready for any eventuality by the first of March next.

The Paris papers announce that England, France and Spain have arrived at a complete understanding relative to Mexico. The convention is to be signed in eight days, and the expedition is to start in the beginning of Nov.

Affairs in Poland remain unchanged. The churches continue closed.

AMERICAN MATTERS ABROAD.—The Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Times writes:—"The Prince Napoleon declares to every one who wishes to hear him, that 'the North is in the right, and has all his sympathies; that the power and strength and greatness of the country lies in the North, and that the wicked and groundless rebellion must and will be subdued.' * * * *

It is now a fact worth remarking, that however much the Bonapartes and the Bourbons may be divided on local personal questions, they are united on the great struggle that is now going on for the preservation of the American Union."

It is reported that the French Senate will be convoked early in December to consider a reform of the Constitution in order to relieve the Government from its heavy responsibilities in financial matters.

The Washington correspondent of the same paper writes as follows "The news from abroad at the State Department is very encouraging. For some reason the London Times is changing its course, the tone of the paper on the war being very much improved Americans in England write that this is caused by the strong sentiment among more intelligent Englishmen—that there must be no interference with the war—and especially because the Times manager has discovered that the English government has no intention, present or future, to break the blockade, or in any way interfere with the course of the war."

FAMINE IN IRELAND.—It is with great pain that we learn the certainty of an approaching famine in the west of Ireland. At a public meeting held on Oct. 6th, at Kilmovee, county Mayo, resolutions were passed to the effect that "about five-sixths of the potato crop, the principal food of the people of this parish and district, are destroyed by the blight and the recent floods;" that, moreover, "if all the corn grown in this mountain parish was converted into meal, it would not give support to the population, numbering about 6,000, for two months." And the melancholy conclusion is drawn that "unless the government grant without delay public works to the people, by which they may be enabled to purchase food, they will perish by starvation."

DOMESTIC NEWS.

GREAT GLOOM CAUSED BY FREMONT'S REMOVAL.—Springfield, Mo., Nov. 4 It would be impossible to exaggerate the gloom which pervaded our camp yesterday, and nothing but General Fremont's urgent endeavors prevented it from ripening into a general mutiny. His quarters were thronged with officers all day, expressing their indignation and inclination to resign.

The Germans were there en masse and talked loudly about resisting forcibly Hunter's assuming command, as the enemy were entrenching themselves upon Wilson's Creek, and nothing was heard of Hunter, and in accordance with their earnest entreaties, Gen. Fremont promised just at dark that he would lead the army to attack them if Hunter did not arrive.

I never saw anything at all approaching the excitement which this announcement created. It caused immense cheering around the headquarters, which spread in all directions from camp to camp, and there was almost uninterrupted cheering, growing more and more remote as the news reached the camps farther and farther from the army. For two hours and a half a dozen bands were serenading the General at once.

Everybody was preparing to start at daylight, and the all pervading disappointment was changed into universal joy. Our army under that inspiration would have whipped 100,000 men, but at ten o'clock General Hunter arrived. He spent an hour and a half with Gen. Fremont, who gave him his plan of battle.

General Hunter assumed command and Gen. Fremont left for St. Louis via Tipton this morning. If we have to fight before the army recovers from its last and cruel disappointment we fear greatly for the result.

Gen Pope is here with his entire division and Hunter's division will be here to-night, when the troops will all be up.

All of Gen. Fremont's staff left with him except Cols. Lovejoy, Shank, and Hudson.

Baltimore, Nov. 7. The following statements were made by the passengers from Old Point: The troops landed at Beaufort, when the bombardment commenced. It is reported that one vessel was disabled.

What success attended the attack is not known; one report says three Federal transports were wrecked. Tatnal, late of the U. S. Navy, is said to be in command of the rebels.

Washington, Nov. 8. We have information from secession sources that thirty thousand troops have been sent from North Carolina and Virginia to repel the landing of the Federal troops at Beaufort. No apprehension is felt on that account, as the landing will be protected by the guns of the fleet.

New-York, Nov. 8. The special Washington dispatch of the Tribune says there is a rumor at Alexandria that the [illegible] pickets, which two days ago were fourteen miles distant, are now but eight miles from the city; that one of our pickets was shot yesterday morning, and that target practice on our pickets has recommenced near Miner Hill.

The New York Evening Post learns that "the Cabinet have determined upon the most active prosecution of the war; there will be no going into winter quarters anywhere; and what is to be done will be done without more delay than is necessary to the conduct of movements so vast and momentous.

A special Fortress Monroe dispatch to the Times says our fleet was bombarding Port Royal, which was said to be in a critical condition and just ready to surrender.

The New York Post quotes from a private letter from Europe, which states that "Prince Napoleon, since his return from America, makes no disguise in expressing, both in public and in private, his decided conviction that the North is not only abundantly able to whip the slaveholders, but that it will do it and ought to do it, and the sooner the better."

Memphis. The Appeal says: "The opinion is very generally expressed that patriotic duty, wise policy and benevolent feeling, all require the planter for the coming year to abandon the planting of cotton for that of corn, wheat, potatoes and other necessaries of life."

Cairo, Ill., Nov. 11. Memphis papers received to-day contain dispatches from Savannah fully confirming the landing of the Naval expedition at Beaufort, and the capture of three forts at Port Royal, Hilton Head, and Bay Point. The Federal forces had possession of the town of Beaufort. The rebels acknowledge that their loss is very large.

A Call for Funds.

The publishing committee of the CHRISTIAN PUBLICATION SOCIETY, deeply sensible of the fact that the time is short, and that our work must be done soon, or not at all, venture this appeal to those interested in disseminating divine truth through the press.

We purpose to commence at ONCE the publication of Tracts upon important Scriptural topics, of vital interest to the church of God in these times of peril and dismay. We wish to present to the household of faith "meat in due season." We wish to scatter light among the benighted of the earth, and so sound out the word of the Lord.

To do this on a scale answering at all to immediate necessities, we propose to raise at once FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, ($500) by special contributions, for this object. This money is designed to obtain and publish tracts, new and old, adapted to the times in which we live. We who engage in the work as publishing committee have no salaries or pay whatever for our services, and we mean that every dollar contributed shall tell in the great work. Each tract will be submitted to the careful examination and judgment of our Editorial Committee, H. L. Hastings, H. F. Carpenter and D. T. Taylor, in whose judgment, ability and prudence the churches can safely confide. Only such tracts as they shall approve will be published by the Society. We expect to furnish tracts cheaper than ANY TRACT SOCIETY in the COUNTRY, and our surplus, beyond the actual expense of issuing them, will be devoted to the purpose of furnishing tracts for gratuitous circulation, or wherever they may be needed.

Brethren, will you help us in this work? Will you give us money? Or will you send us $100, $50, $20, or $10, to be repaid in TRACTS, at cheap rates, when you shall choose to order them? We wish this work to move on at once. We therefore call for $500, and pledge ourselves to see it used in a manner that shall tend to accomplish the desired object. We do not wish to divert the funds of the World's Crisis for this work, nor has its treasury sufficient money that can be spared for this purpose. We call upon all interested in publishing and scattering cheap Tracts, to contribute for this object. Will not preachers take hold of it? Will not churches make collections and remit them?

No fear need be entertained that the work will be delayed. As soon as a portion of it is raised, and tracts are prepared, it can begin, and each dollar added will facilitate the object and extend the operations of the society. Come, then, to the work. Send us donations, pledges, or loans, to be repaid in publications, in amounts from a hundred dollars to a widow's mite; and with them let your prayers ascend, that God's blessing may attend our efforts and crown them with success. Monies should be sent to Miles Grant, Editor of the World's Crisis, Boston, Mass.

☞ PREMIUM TRACT!! ☜

THE CHRISTIAN PUBLICATION SOCIETY offer a premium of TEN DOLLARS for the best TRACT on THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES, and the tokens of the near approach of the Kingdom of God.

The Tract should be plainly written, on only one side of the paper, (covering about 24 pages foolscap, in ordinary hand writing,) and the manuscripts should be accompanied by a sealed envelope containing the author's name. If more than one manuscript is retained, satisfactory payment will be made for the same. Rejected MSS. are to be at their author's disposal, and the committee may reject all if thought best by them.

Manuscripts should be sent to the Crisis office, addressed to the "EDITORIAL COMMITTEE OF THE WORLD'S CRISIS, BOSTON, MASS., or to H. L. Hastings, D. T. Taylor, or H. F. Carpenter, Editorial Committee, on or before January 1st, 1862.

For the Crisis.

My Eden Home.

Sweet Eden home! I think of thee
While in this world of sin and doom;
My soul desires thy joys to see,
Land of the blest, dear Eden home.

How trifling earthly things, compared
With that bright city soon to come,
For God's own faithful saints prepared—
Their glorious rest, their Eden home.

The power of death we daily see,
Consigning to the silent tomb
The friends in whose loved company
We travel to our Eden home.

They sleep in Jesus and are blest—
How sweet their rest till Jesus comes,
And wakes them, by the trumpet's blast,
To enter in their Eden home.

While we who longer sojourn here,
Must travel on through shine and storm,
Yet Jesus lives, our hearts to cheer,
And guide us to our Eden home.

We'll look away from earthly things,
And think on glorious things to come;
We'll in that land be priest and king,
And reign in our own Eden home.

There joys substantial we shall share,
When, rising on that joyful morn,
We meet our Savior in the air,
And see that long-lost Eden home.

O, land of light, and love, and peace!
We see thy brightness through the gloom,
And daily pray, O Savior, haste!
And take us to our Eden home.

New Jersey. MARY.

For the Crisis.

A Looking Glass, held by a Handmaiden of the Lord.

"Wo unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous, and say, If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. Wherefore, ye be witnesses unto yourselves, that ye are the children of them which killed the prophets. Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers."—MATT. 23: 29-32.

What was it to build the tombs of the prophets and to garnish the sepulchres of the righteous? Was it not to hide these holy men from view, by diverting attention from their records and deeds to their tombs and sepulchres? or by making tombs and sepulchres of their words and deeds? Most certainly this was the sense in which they did it. What were the facts in the case? There stood before them the very "spirit of prophecy" fulfilled—the Messias of the Old Testament; and yet, the testimony of prophets and righteous men, so accurately fulfilled in Him, was all covered up in their tombs of unbelief and their garnished sepulchres of tradition, while they themselves thirsted for his heart's blood, piously saying at the same time with their lips, Had we been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets. For this cause they witnessed unto themselves, and to all men, that they were the legitimate children of them that killed the prophets, in that they inherited their true spirit, to honor the dead in words while they condemned the living unto death who believed and practised the records and deeds of those they professed to honor. Are there none at this day who do these same things? Are there none now-a-days who, in the same sense, build the tombs of apostles and prophets, and of the Lord Jesus Christ himself, and garnish the sepulchres of the martyrs, and say with their lips, Had we lived in the days of Isaiah, and Jesus, and Paul, we would not have been partakers in their blood;—while at the same time they condemn utterly all those who confess the fulfillment of the predictions and obey the precepts of these messengers sent from God?

Who will endure their "sound doctrine," in these days preceding the second advent, any more than the professed people of God in the days preceding the first advent? Who among his professed people now will endure the "sound doctrine" given in the 24th of Matt., 21st of Luke, and the 11th of Rev., as SIGNS that "the kingdom of God is nigh at hand," any better than his people endured to be told in the days of the first advent, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel"? Do they not at once raise their great tomb of unbelief over the whole of this sound doctrine, and then garnish it all over with their "fables"? Just so with the sound doctrine that "the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and MAN became a living soul," instead of an immortal soul, as it made when garnished by their fables; and so on to the end of the chapter—unbelief and fables now, as it was tradition and unbelief then—and "so they wrap it up." Please read this scripture—Micah 7th—and witness if its typical fulfillment is not before us!

Now let us ask if this spirit—to honor the dead, while it condemns the living who personify the dead—(the very spirit that is shedding all the blood in the political world, a foreshadowing of what is coming in the religious,) led the possessors of it to kill the prophets, and led their "children" to kill the "Heir" and his apostles, and their followers, "in a green tree," will not this same spirit, witnessed by these their grand-children, lead them to the same acts of violence "in the dry?" Luke 23: 31. Please read from the 27th verse, and then answer, if the days of the dry tree are not opening before us in their typical bearing? How do Christian mothers feel who have sons in this war? Do they not feel that their labor is illy requited? and, had they not the hope in God that it may be made a furnace to purify rather than to destroy, would they not feel that it were better that they never had been born? Has not the sentiment been extorted from many a weeping mother in our land, "Blessed are the barren, and the wombs that never bare, and the paps which never gave suck," as she has seen her son, whom she dedicated to God in his infancy with fastings and prayers night and day, all in his manly beauty, seized with this infatuation, and leave the paternal roof without her blessing, (conscientiously withheld from him)—the first time in his life going contrary to her advice, after having consulted her? Surely, these days are upon us; but it is only the beginning of the end!

Let us now look into the scenes in their end. We read, in Rev. 20: 4, "And I saw the souls (persons) of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." We also read, in Rev. 13: 11, and onward—"And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth, and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake like a dragon. And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, (verse 1,) and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed; and he doeth great wonders . . . and deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast; saying to those who dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword and did live. And he (the two-horned beast) had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed; and he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads; and that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark or the name of the beast, or the number of his name."

We now read in Rev. 6: 9, and onward, "And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls (persons) of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held; and they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood upon them that dwell on the earth? And white robes (only in vision) were given to every one of them; and it was said unto them that they should rest for a little season, until their fellow-servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled." Those who cry, "how long," we all believe were slain under the first beast, in the great apostacy; and they are here quieted with the assurance that, as soon as the last martyr had suffered, they should be avenged. Immediately upon these comforting words to them, the sixth seal opens, and the signs preceding the time of their being avenged begin to be developed.

We are now in this series (Rev. 6: 12–14) between the falling stars and the departing heavens, when "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bond-man, and every free-man, hid themselves in the rocks of the mountains, and said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: for the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand"? synchronizing so perfectly with our Saviour's words upon the dry tree. "Then shall they begin to say to the mountains, Fall on us; and to the hills, Cover us," etc. Luke 23: 30. Those beheaded in Rev. 20: 4, were those who would not worship the beast, neither his image, nor receive his mark upon the forehead, or in their hand; therefore, some of these must be beheaded under this two-horned beast; and we find that this two-horned beast is the great and last enemy that the saints have to contend with, from the time of his rise in Rev. 13: 11, until his destruction in verse 19: and their first and great triumphal anthem is, that they have "gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name": and the very first vial of the last plagues is to fall in judgment upon the men who have his mark, and who worship his image. "Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast." Verse 18. "The wise shall understand." E. S. W.

Harden not your Heart.

"He that being often reproved, and hardeneth his heart, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy."

There are times when this language ought to be applied to certain persons, on certain occasions, and yet it is hardly ever applied to them. We ask, why not? It is because persons do not like to think that God visits persons with his judgments, or sends his judgments upon nations when they have been often reproved of their sins, and still harden their heart, and will not repent of their doings. The Antediluvians were a nation which suffered the vengeance of their Creator. They were reproved of wickedness by the preaching of Noah, and yet they would not repent, but wickedness increased until Noah finished the ark and entered into it, and the flood came, and they were all suddenly destroyed, and that without remedy. We ask, ought there to have been mercy shown them? We think not, because they were warned by Noah all the time he was building the ark. We think that God knew best what to do with them, as long as they would not repent and turn from their wickedness.

Again, the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were overthrown and destroyed on account of their wickedness. If there could have been ten righteous persons found among that wicked people, there would have been a remedy found for them, and they, with their property, might have been saved. But the search was made, and those ten could not be found, and so they had to suffer the wrath and vengeance of Almighty God.

Again, the nation which held the children of Israel in bondage were a great many of them destroyed. They were a wicked people, and hardened their hearts against God, and would not let Israel go. And we see there was no remedy for those who suffered death by the plagues that God sent among them, neither was there any for those who were drowned in the Red Sea. Again, when the children of Israel had rebelled against God in the wilderness, they were reproved, but they hardened their hearts and necks, and had to be destroyed. No remedy was found for that great number Cain brought out of the land of Egypt, for they all fell, and were all destroyed in the wilderness with the exception of two. We might say that they justly merited the wrath and judgments of God for their many sins, and their rebellion towards their Creator. And while they were in the land of Canaan they rebelled against God, and hardened their hearts and necks, and departed from the Lord. God's holy seers reproved them, and predicted what would follow if they did not repent and serve the true God, but they would not hearken to the voice of the Lord; they still continued to walk contrary to the laws of God, and by so doing they were many times repulsed in battle with their enemies, and many things befell them which would not otherwise have befallen them had they obeyed. Many of them were destroyed by their enemies, and no remedy was found for them, for God used those heathen nations as an instrument to punish them.

Again, the Savior came to earth to save that which was lost. He came to his own, and his own received him not, for they hardened their necks against him, and would not listen to him when he reproved and rebuked them; but they set him at naught, despised and mocked him, and at last they killed him. For this God's judgments were sent upon them, and they as a nation were destroyed and scattered, and we might say that they were suddenly destroyed and that without remedy.

We will now examine one individual case which came under my own observation. In the town where I now reside there lived, a few years ago, an amiable young man, who was surrounded with a large circle of kind friends, by whom he was much loved. He seemed to possess a kind and even disposition; with a smile on his cheek, and the brightness of youthful life in his eye, he always had a kind word for all. And we might say that he was a good moral young man, but yet there was one thing lacking, and that was Christ formed within the hope of glory. He would attend the meetings when there was a revival of religion, and, although fully convinced that he needed something more than what he had to save him, and while others were moved by the Spirit of God, he would sit and smile at the movements of the rest, to carry off conviction. Although being often reproved, he would smile, seemingly hardening his heart more and more. At length the revivals were past, and not long after, on New Year's day, as he and some of his companions were engaged in shooting fowls, suddenly one of their pieces discharged, and the contents lodged in his leg. He immediately fell to the ground, exclaiming, "I am shot." He was carried to his home, where every thing possible was done to ease him of his sufferings and pain. At length it was thought advisable to amputate his limb to save his life; but it was of no avail, for in one short week he closed his eyes in death. Just before his death a messenger came for my father to go, with others, and pray for him. When told the fact, the words at the head of this article came to my mind. We might add more, but I think that this is sufficient proof that God does send his judgments upon nations and individuals in this life. B. H. STRAIGHT.

SLAVERY.—Says the Rev. Dr. Ellis, of Boston, "It was the oft-quoted saying of Thomas Jefferson, all the more impressive because his sayings were not often pitched in the tones of devotion and piety—"If there be a righteous God in heaven, a terrible retribution awaits this people because of the sin of slavery!"

☞ Somebody asked Voltaire the difference between the good and the beautiful. He replied, "the good requires proof, the beautiful does not."

Invocation.

Father of nations,
On thee we call—
In humble prostration,
We—one and all,

Implore thy protection—
Thy wisdom and power;
Do thou give direction
In this evil hour.

From evil defend us—
From war and commotion—
Has anarchy rends us
From its land to ocean.

And thine be the praise,
The glory and power,
Ancient of days,
Forever, evermore. D. S. S.

Indian-Grove Meeting.

Thinking some of our Father's family would like to hear how the cause of Christ is progressing in this part of Illinois, I thought I would for that purpose write a brief account of a meeting that has just closed in our vicinity.

Some month or more ago, a subscription paper was circulated among the people for the purpose of raising money to defray the expenses of Bro. and Sr. Mansfield to our neighborhood, to hold a series of meetings. This paper was circulated by two ladies not belonging to any denomination. God blessed their efforts. The money was given principally by those who did not belong to our people. Thus you see there is an interest to hear the truth.

The brethren here have not been able to build a place of worship as yet; so we had to try getting a house of some other denomination; and succeeded in getting the Disciples' house, those brethren very kindly opening the doors of their commodious house to us. May the Lord bless them for their kindness. We then wrote to Bro. and Sr. Mansfield, who arrived on the 19th and began the meeting at 2 o'clock, same day, in a sermon on Love, by Sr. M., followed in the evening by Bro. M. in a discourse on Peace. So you see, brethren, we had the best of foundation to build our meeting upon—Love and Peace. Had meetings in the evening only until Thursday, when we had a discourse in the afternoon. On Saturday evening, Sr. M. gave a Bible reason for improving her talent in the public assembly, which was convincing and solid; and I do not believe there was one in that vast concourse of people but was convinced that it was a woman's duty to improve her talent in the church.

Sunday morning partook of a love feast, which will be remembered by the brethren here as long as time lasts. Truly we had a good time. After the love feast, Bro. Mansfield preached a soul-stirring sermon from 1 Pet. 1: 11, after which there was a collection taken for the benefit of Bro. and Sr. Mansfield, which amounted to something over thirty dollars. Sister M. preached in the afternoon from Isa. 9: 7, a very feeling and appropriate discourse, after which we partook of the broken body and shed blood of our Lord, which closed our meeting. The judgment only will disclose the good that will follow. The house was full all through the meeting, and on Sabbaths was crowded. Not a harsh or unloving word was heard, and the very best of order prevailed through the entire meeting. Our sincere thanks are due to those dear brethren for opening the doors of their commodious place of worship to us, and to Robert Lair especially for his kind, gentlemanly, and christian conduct during this meeting. The Lord reward them.

Many brethren came from a distance, and with us had their souls refreshed; were strengthened and built up in our most holy faith. In closing I will say that there is a large and rich field out in this western country, which could be plowed, sowed, and finally garnered into the store-house of the Almighty, if there could be sufficient laborers sent into the vineyard to water and tenderly care for it. May the Lord of the harvest put it into the hearts of some of the many preaching brethren to come out into this beautiful prairie land and preach the gospel of the kingdom of God. I think they could be well sustained until the Lord comes. May he come quickly, is the prayer of your brother in Christ.

Little Things.

BRO. GRANT:—We are admonished in the word of God not to despise the day of small things; and we know that means which appear to us of little consequence are sometimes used to accomplish great results. A few weeks since, I proposed to send the back numbers of the Crisis to any one who could do good with them. I have received two letters in relation to them; one from a Sister in New York, and one from another in Pa., both of whom wish to distribute them among those who have never seen them. The one from Pa. writes,—"Could you send me the papers spoken of, I would circulate them as far as possible. I hope good might be done. I have thought of writing to the Crisis friends to learn, if any have tracts, good plain ones, on the coming of Christ, the signs of the times, the kingdom, and immortality only at the resurrection, destruction of the wicked, etc., laying by and no one to read them. I could find use for them here." She says there are a number of sects there, but no preaching of the coming kingdom. They have heard of the things concerning our faith, and would read. So here, as in many other places, there is an opportunity to scatter the seed, which may germinate and take root; and I wish to say to any who have tracts or papers they can spare, to send them on. I think we in this section ought to form a kind of a receiving and distributing society. There are brethren and sisters scattered over the country who could act as distributors.

In this way, in these hard times, the truth might be circulated without much expense. Keep the ball rolling. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand, for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good." Our working time will soon be over, and what we desire to do for the salvation of our fellow men must be done soon, or forever remain undone. "Behold the Judge standeth before the door."

The Groaning.

"For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened."—2 Cor. 5: 4.

We groan in this tent, because of what we feel we want, as well as from what we positively suffer. Nor will our groaning cease but with our breathing. We shall have to groan over our carnality, worldliness, concupiscence, dullness, deadness, darkness and unbelief. We shall groan for liberty, holiness, and perfect, uninterrupted peace. We do groan now, as some of us have for years; and we shall groan until mortality is swallowed up of life. We shall go down to the grave groaning, but from thence the ransomed of the Lord shall return with singing, and everlasting joy shall be upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away. My brother, is thy poor body the seat of disease, of strong pain? Dost thou feel fettered by it, and pent up in it? Art thou groaning as a poor prisoner for freedom? Lift up thy head, for thy redemption draweth nigh. The resurrection morning will soon break on this groaning world, and then the last groan of God's Church will be lost in everlasting songs. Jesus is coming; and when he comes, then will come the world's jubilee. Every fetter will then be knocked off, every prison-door will be opened, every sufferer will enjoy freedom from pain, and every form of disease will flee away. "We groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body." Rom. 8: 24.—American Messenger.

The Promise of Immortality.

Who, that has seen the bright, the gifted, the beautiful, closing his eyes forever on this world, and sleeping in death, can be insensible to the power of this glorious passage from St. Paul, "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality," and of the verses immediately following?

Deeply, and thankfully do we feel the sublime consolations resulting from our intuitions and our spiritual longings for the unseen and the immortal, arguing that their very existence is a proof that these cravings may be answered and supplied; but what can be so inspiring as the promises from the holiest of books, the highest Divine authority, which we read and drink into our sorrowing hearts as a revelation from heaven itself? We have known its power of consolation. The striken father has pored over, and marked for the comfort of those who afterward laid him to rest, the holy passage, closing with the sustaining, the soul-stirring words, "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, by his written word. Deep experience knows and owns this blessed power over the longing, the loving, the suffering heart.—Herald of Gospel Liberty.

God's Way and Man's Way.

God says: Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness, and all these (earthly things) shall be added unto you.

Man says: Seek first worldly wealth and fame and power; religion you can get on a dying-bed.

God says: Give, and it shall be given unto you; good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, shall men give into your bosoms.

Man says: Charity begins at home. Why give to others that for which you have toiled so hard? Your own family may want it.

God says: Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?

Man says: What guaranty have I, if I give my earnings to the poor, that I shall not come to want myself?

God says: There is that that scattereth, and yet increaseth.

Man says: It is only by saving and hoarding what you have, that it will increase.

Reader, what says your conscience? Is not God's way better than man's?—Amer. Missionary.

EVERY DAY RELIGION.—There is not much solidity in a religion that will not stand the test of every day experience. "There are a good many pious people," says Douglas Jerrold, "who are as careful of their religion as of their best service of china, only using it for holiday occasions, for fear it should get clipped or flawed in working day wear." That species of religion may do for a show, but there is little substance in it. It is too much of the gilt ginger-bread sort for the general service of mankind. It can do little good in the eyes of one who judges us not by the exterior, but by the interior evidence of excellence. Religion, to be serviceable, must not only be substantial, but active. It must not be drowsy. It must be wide awake, vigilant and sturdy.

PERFECT HAPPINESS.—A laundress, who was employed in the family of one of our former governors, said to him with a sigh:

"Only think, your excellency, how little money would make me happy."

"How little, madam?" says the governor.

"O! dear sir, one hundred dollars would make me perfectly happy."

"If that is all, you shall have it," and he immediately gave it to her.

She looked at it with joy and thankfulness, and before the governor was out of hearing, exclaimed: "I wish I had said two hundred."

"SHROUDS HAVE NO POCKETS."—For we brought nothing into this world, and surely we can carry nothing out. Grasp the gold that we gather ever so tightly, there is no pocket in the grave clothes we will wear, in which we can hide any treasure that will be of no use to us when God takes away the soul. Foolish then it is to lay up treasures on the earth, when there is no currency here that is not worthless in that better country, whither we ought to be going.

THE TWO ARCHITECTS.—Two architects were once candidates for the building of a certain temple at Athens. The first harangued the crowd very learnedly upon the different orders of architecture, and showed them in what manner the temple should be built. The other, who got up after him, only observed that what his brother had spoken he could do; and thus he at once gained the cause. Such is the difference between the speculative and the practical christian.

☞ In simplicity is real power. Ostentation is the shadowy semblance of it. Plain people, plain deeds, plain thoughts, and plain words, tell most in the results of life, and in the affairs of the world.

Hygiene.

"This is for your Health."—Paul.

Healthful Observances.

1. To eat when you do not feel like it is brutal, nay, this is a slander on the lower animals, they do not so debase themselves.

2. Do not enter a sick-chamber on an empty stomach, nor remain as a watcher or nurse until you feel almost exhausted, nor sit between the patient and the fire, nor in the direction of a current of air from the patient toward yourself, nor eat or drink any thing after being in a sick-room until you have rinsed your mouth thoroughly.

3. Do not sleep in any garment worn through the day.

4. Most grown persons are unable to sleep soundly and refreshingly, over seven hours in summer, and eight in winter; the attempt to force more sleep on the system by a nap in the day-time, or a "second nap" in the morning, renders the whole of the sleep disturbed and imperfect.

5. Some of the most painful "stomach aches" are occasioned by indigestion, this generates wind, and hence distension. It is often properly remedied by kneading the abdomen with the ball of the hand, skin to skin, from one side to another, from the lower edge of the ribs downwards, because the accumulated air is forced on and outwards along the alimentary canal.

6. When you return to your house from a long walk or other exhaustive exercise, go to the fire or warm room, and do not remove a single article of clothing until you have taken a cup or more of some kind of hot drink.

7. In going into a colder atmosphere, keep the mouth closed, and walk with a rapidity sufficient to keep off a feeling of chilliness.

8. Two pair of thin stockings will keep the feet warmer than one pair of a greater thickness than both.

9. The "night-sweats" of disease come on towards daylight, their deathly clamminess and coldness is greatly modified by sleeping in a single, loose, long woolen shirt.

10. The man or woman who drinks a strong cup of strong tea or coffee, or other stimulant, in order to aid in the better performance of any work or duty, public or private, is a fool, because it is to the body and brain an expenditure of what is not yet got; it is using power in advance, and this can never be done, even once, with impunity.

11. The less a man drinks of any thing in hot weather the better, for the more we drink the more we want to drink, until even ice-water palls and becomes of a metallic taste; hence the longer you can put off drinking cold water on the morning of a hot day, the better will you feel at night.

12. Drinking largely at meals, even of cold water or simple teas, is a mere habit and is always hurtful. No one should drink at any one meal more than a quarter of a pint of any liquid, even of cold water, for it always retards, impairs, and interferes with a healthful digestion.

13. If you sleep at all in the day-time, it will interfere with the soundness of your sleep at night much less, if the nap be taken in the forenoon.

14. A short nap in the daytime may be necessary to some. Let it not exceed ten minutes, to this end sleep with the forehead resting on a chair-back or edge of the table.

25. Never swallow an atom of food while in a passion, or if under any great mental excitement, whether of a depressing or elevating character; brutes won't do it.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Ventilation by Night.

I speak of the absence of ventilation—of night ventilation in particular—the so pregnant source of disease and death, for I look upon the exclusion of a pure atmosphere by night as the one efficient and acting source of consumption and scrofula. Without a continuous supply of pure oxygen, in the proportion presented by the atmosphere, the effete waste of the body cannot be burned off. And if the effete waste be not all burned off, the inevitable sequence, as I conceive, is the deposit of the residue in the guise of tubercle, either internally in the different forms of consumption, or externally in the various aspects of scrofula. Every one knows how the poor are decimated by these maladies. That they are so, arises from the insufficient supply of oxygen, whether during working hours, the hours of relaxation, and very especially those devoted to repose. The difficulty of ventilation is enhanced by the evil construction of windows, those in the houses of the town poor especially. They are made to lift, but, in order to avoid the pitiful outlay of a few shillings for cords, weights, pulleys, they are not made, as they ought to be made, to pull down. The large woolen wedge inserted on each side, to prevent the upper window sash from descending, viewing it as an impediment to ventilation, has proved the most lethal instrument of destruction in the world. Instructions should be issued from masters to their workmen, from parents to children, from house owners to their tenants, from doctors to their patients, from divines to their flocks, to pull down the windows of living and sleeping chambers at all convenient hours during the day, and invariably in winter and summer during the night. There is no other way than this, by a door, as it were, direct into the ocean of the atmosphere which subsists about us, to secure an ever fresh supply of untainted oxygen, and I maintain, a more or less perfect immunity from the ravages of scrofulous or consumptive maladies.—Dr. M'Cormac in Builder.

Use of Tobacco.

It has been carefully estimated by physicians that in the United States, 20,000 persons die annually from the use of tobacco. In Germany physicians have calculated that, of all the deaths which occur between the ages of eighteen and twenty-six, one half originate in the waste of the constitution by smoking. Tobacco exhausts and deranges the nervous powers, and produces a long train of nervous and other diseases, to which the stomach is liable, and especially those forms that go under the name of dyspepsia. It also exerts a disastrous influence on the mind. I am personally acquainted with several individuals, now at Lunatic Asylums, whose minds first became impaired by the use of tobacco.

☞ THE CRISIS is devoted to the exposition of all Bible truth; especially, the doctrine of the immediate, personal coming and reign of Christ on the earth; holiness of heart; the unconscious state of the dead; their literal resurrection, and the final destruction of the wicked.

For the Crisis.

Why will Ye Die?

Why will ye die, oh mortal men,
Whose wayward footsteps turn from God?
Why will ye sink in woe and pain?
Why fall beneath the Almighty's rod?

Why will ye die, since Jesus died
To bear your sin, your curse remove;
Why will you die, since from his side
Flows forth the tide of life and love?

Why will ye die, when God invites,
And to his favor bids you come;
Why will ye die, when Jesus waits
To call, and seek, and bring you home?

Why will ye die? Oh, mortals, turn
To Jesus; come, for mercy cry,
Lest love abused in wrath shall burn,
And every soul that sins shall die.

Evening Shadows.—No. 13.

"I will show wonders in the heavens."—JOEL.
"Fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven."—LUKE.

The time of the end, so denominated by the prophet Daniel, is doubtless the time in which we are now living, and was declared to be a period in which knowledge was to be increased. During this season God would exhibit his flaming signals in the heavens, as a timely warning to the last generation, that they might be prepared to meet him in peace, and to enter his kingdom, where there shall be fullness of joy and pleasures forevermore.

Dear reader, we are not only living in the time of the end, but it is very evident we are amid the closing up scenes of the time, and there seems to be a very general impression that some great event is about to transpire. What else can it be, I ask, but what the Almighty has clearly set forth in his word? It is the day of burning and perdition of ungodly men. For the last sixty years mysterious signs have been seen in the heavens, and truly a multitude of them may be justly termed "wonders." I now purpose to present a few facts among the many that have accumulated on my hands. The first is from a New York paper. I am unable to give the date, as I neglected to note it.

"SOLAR PHENOMENON.—An unusual and beautiful solar phenomenon was visible today, in this city, for about two hours this morning. The sun appeared to be surrounded by several rings, of different shades, shapes and centres. Two rings, with the sun nearly in their centres, appeared, and intersected each other at two opposite points. The inner circumference of the rings within the points of intersection were dark, but beyond the points of intersection they were luminous. Several other circles and arcs of circles appeared, with the sun either in their circumference or near one side. Under the sun was the appearance of an inverted rainbow. The phenomenon was exceedingly curious and interesting, and needs the description of a scientific observer to give a proper and adequate delineation of it. We trust that some one competent to do so will submit to the public such a description. The appearance is very unusual in this latitude. It is supposed to be caused by the refractions and reflections of light on moisture, snow, or ice, suspended in the atmosphere. One similar to that of to-day was observed in Connecticut, Sept. 9, 1844, and another of the same character at Jackson, Tenn., Jan. 1, 1824. The Millerites, we understand, regard the phenomenon as a sign of 'the end of all things.'"

The above writer does in reality give us some credit for the possession of some degree of faith in what God has spoken. The following, without date, I clipped from a Boston paper some few years since:—

"ELECTRICAL PHENOMENON.—Evening before last, between the hours of eight and nine o'clock, our attention was attracted to the curious appearance of the sky, by the almost continuous flashes of lightning which followed each other without a moment's intermission. We, in company with many others, were tempted, by its singular brilliancy, to watch it for a considerable time. Stretching from south east towards the north, a mass of grotesque and fantastic clouds, occupying about one-sixth part of the circle of the horizon, formed as it were a vaporous wale, behind which a sea of intense electric light, possessing somewhat of the appearance of the Aurora Borealis, filled the entire space; whilst momentary flashes of what is called chain and forked lightning rent asunder the masses of the clouds with streaks. These streaks varied in color from the pale effulgence of a silver line to the fearful blood-red streak of angry omen in superstitious minds. Its forms were still more wondrous, far eclipsing the noblest efforts of the pyrotechnic art. Letters of the alphabet were distinctly visible. I, J and K were as plainly seen as the moon, then calmly filling her accustomed place in another part of the heavens."—Savannah Republican.

This was truly a fearful sight and a wonder in the heavens; but, alas! alas! out of sight, out of mind, soon forgotten, although a sure forerunner of the coming of the day of doom and perdition of ungodly men.

A writer in an English Review calls the attention of his readers to a deeper interest in these mysterious matters, in the following language:—

"THE DOOM OF OUR WORLD.—What this change is to be, we dare not even conjecture, but we see in the heavens themselves some traces of destructive elements, and some indications of their power. The fragments of broken planets, the descent of meteoric stones upon our globe, the wheeling of comets welding their loose material at the solar furnace, the appearance of new stars, and the disappearance of others, are all foreshadows of the impending convulsions to which the system of the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burned up, and under the heavens which are to pass away; thus treading, as it were, on the cemeteries, and dwelling upon the mausoleums of former worlds,—let us learn the lesson of humiliation and wisdom, if we have not already been taught in the school of Revelation."—North British Review.

There need be no conjecture on the subject of the change that is about to transpire. The Lord Jesus, in the 21st chapter of Luke, enumerated the signs in the heavens in connection with great natural calamities that were to transpire during his absence. In reviewing the subject as recorded by the Evangelist Luke, we see clearly that we have now reached the point when it is possible for the humble follower of his Lord and Master to know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand—a new heavens, a new earth, a new Jerusalem, a new creation of all things, and all the ransomed immortal millions singing a new song. Truly, the coming of Jesus is a great practical doctrine. Everlasting thanks be ascribed to God and the Lamb for his goodness to poor unworthy me in permitting me to hear the joyful sound, and see the evidences of a speedy restitution of all things spoken by his holy prophets.

Come, dear reader, look around—see the sad condition of all the world, our own country foaming and seething like a boiling cauldron, distress and perplexity becoming more and more intense. Awake! awake! the Judge is at the door. For nineteen years we have been on the watch-tower looking for the light to brighten. Now we can say truly, "The morning cometh." Prepare! prepare! We shall soon hear the trumpet sound that calls the exiles home. Watchman! give the trumpet a certain sound. Our night of unrest is almost over, thank God! The day is breaking! Redemption most certainly is near!

We shall soon meet where sorrow never lives
And pleasure never dies.

An Exposition of Matt. 10: 28.

BY H. V. REED.

"And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."

This text above all others has been quoted to prove that man is a compound of two distinct and separate natures, mortality and immortality. It is introduced for two purposes,—1st. To show that the soul is immortal. 2nd. That the wicked will suffer forever in Gehenna. As we have but little room for criticism, we shall have to be brief upon each point made above. And first, we are led to inquire,

1. DOES THE TEXT IN HAND TEACH THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL? The position is affirmed from this one consideration; that man can kill the body, but not the soul. Therefore it is presumed that the soul cannot die, or is immortal. But logically it only affirms that man does not possess the power to kill the soul, and not that it is beyond all power; for the latter part of the text plainly declares that God is able to destroy the soul. Hence the contrast is between the power of God and of man, and not that the soul is indestructible. All admit that if man had power to kill the soul it could not be considered immortal. Very well: now apply your logic. God has that power, and is able to kill the soul. Hence from your premises the argument fails. If the soul is immortal and cannot die, then its existence is placed beyond all power; but from the simple fact that God is able to destroy it, we cannot argue its immortality. Hence the position fails; for if it is subject to a power which can finally kill, it matters not whether that power is in God or man. The ultimate is the same in either case. But another argument for its immortality is inferred from the phrase "soul and body," as though the soul was something distinct from the body. If this form of expression proves that the soul is an ENTITY distinct from its body, then it follows that man is a plurality of entities; for we read that we are to love God with the "HEART," and with the "SOUL," and with the "STRENGTH," and with the "MIND." Luke 10: 27. Now would any one argue that these were all distinct from each other as entities, or that these were attributes of a unit man? Undoubtedly the latter position would be taken by all thinking minds. But would it not be as consistent to argue that these were all separate, and would live separately after death, as to argue the immortality of the soul from the phrase soul and body? Certainly it would. But again, this position is made plainer by another quotation. Isa. 10: 16, 18, "And shall consume the glory of his forest, and of his fruitful field, both soul and body." Says Dr. A. Clarke, this is a "proverbial expression," signifying that they should be "entirely and altogether consumed." It would certainly be absurd to infer the immortality of the forest because the soul and body is applied to it. The expression most clearly denotes the whole being, including the idea of a future life; that is, in the text under examination; for Luke quotes the same idea from the Savior, and leaves out this Hebrew proverbial phrase. Luke 12: 4—"And I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear; Fear him, which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, Fear him." Luke wrote in purer Greek than did Matthew, and the reader will perceive that Luke expresses the same idea, without the Hebraism, "soul and body." In the above text we are shown that all man can do is to kill in this state of things, but his power extends no farther. But Jesus, after he has killed, has power to cast into hell, which makes a finality of the being, whereas man can kill in this state, and his power extends only to the grave. But God can raise up the being, and cast into Gehenna. Therefore we should fear God and not man. B. Wilson, in "Emphatic Diaglott," gives a translation of Matt. 10: 28, in perfect harmony with the foregoing position. "Be not afraid of THOSE who KILL the BODY but cannot destroy the (future) LIFE, but rather HIM who CAN utterly destroy both Life and Body in Gehenna."

This undoubtedly presents the idea of the original more clearly.

Hence the text would simply indicate, "Be not afraid of those who can temporarily destroy you, for God can raise you up; but fear him who can finally and utterly destroy you in Gehenna!"

That man can destroy the soul, in Dr. McCulloch's translation, is of the same import. The sense of a temporary destruction is clear from the Holy oracles. Josh. 10: 37, "And they took it, (the city,) * * * and the king thereof, * * * and all the souls that were therein, * * * but destroyed it utterly, and ALL THE SOULS that were therein." And chap. 11: 11, "And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, UTTERLY destroying them; there was not any left to breathe."

Says Job, "My soul chooseth strangling and death rather than my life," Job 7: 15. Says David, "none can keep alive his own soul," Psa. 22: 29. And that God "made a way to his anger, he spared not their soul from death," Psa. 78: 50. God says by Ezekiel, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," Ezk. 18: 4. These testimonies will satisfy all who believe God's word, that there is a temporal death here inflicted on the soul of man.

Perhaps it might be well to state, the word soul properly means the whole man. Thus God formed man of dust, and man became a living soul, Gen. 2: 7. Again, there were so many souls (persons) came out of Jacob's loins, Gen. 46: 26. No soul in Israel was to eat blood, Lev. 17: 12. Souls went down into Egypt; souls went into a ship, &c., &c.

As some may think that the word soul signifies the immortal part of man, I will give a list of ways in which the Hebrew word Nephesh (Soul) is translated in our Bible. It is translated soul 475 times, life 120; and is also translated men, person, self, body, they, appetite, lust, creature, &c. The reader will at once see the impropriety of assuming that the soul is immortal from the meaning of the word. Says Dr. McCulloch, "There is no word in the Hebrew language that signifies either soul or spirit in the technical sense in which we use the terms, as implying something distinct from the body." See Cred. of the Scriptures, Vol. 2. Says the learned Parkhurst, "Nephesh, (soul,) as a noun, has been supposed to signify the spiritual part of man, or what is called his soul. I must for myself confess that I can find no passage where it has undoubtedly this meaning."

The learned, as well as the word of God, protest against the idea that the word soul means that which is immortal. From the foregoing arguments we arrive at the following conclusions:—

1. Soul means the whole man in a primary sense, or a creature that lives by breathing, and is applied to the attributes of a being.

2. That the soul dies, or may be destroyed in the sense of a temporal death.

3. That the learned find no such meaning as that which is now applied to the word soul. We call attention to these facts, so that the reader may see that the Bible is pointedly against the modern form of the doctrine that the soul never dies, God declaring plainly, that "the soul that sinneth it shall die," Ezk. 18: 4. And men say it never will die; but we say, "fear him, who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." And this brings us to notice another point in the text,—

II. THE MEANING OF THE WORD HELL.

It is assumed that the wicked will live forever in torment, from the fact that the word hell denotes a place of unceasing woe, in which bad men will always exist in pain. We shall now proceed to examine the term in question, and see if it denotes any such place.

The word translated hell in the text under consideration is in Greek, Gehenna, and is a compound from two words, Ge signifying earth or land, and Hinnom; and properly means the valley of Hinnom, southeast from Jerusalem, and was anciently celebrated for the horrid worship of Moloch. It was polluted with all manner of carcasses of animals and dead bodies; constant fires were kept burning to avert the pestilence which would inflict the city. In this place the Jews placed the brazen image Moloch; they not only sacrificed animals upon it, but even threw their own children upon its arms, from whence they fell into the fires at its feet, and to avoid the shrieks and groans of dying infants they would beat the Toph (a drum) to drown their cries. Hence they anciently called it Tophet, signifying a drum. This practice was abolished by Josiah. 2 Kings 23: 10. This word occurs twelve times in the New Testament, which the reader can examine. Matt. 5: 22, 29, 30; 10: 28; 18: 9; 23: 15, 33; Mark 9: 43, 45, 47; Luke 12: 5; James 3: 6. These are the only places in the New Testament where this word is found. We find no place in all these references that sustains the popular view, that it is a place of ceaseless woe. The reader will perceive that the meaning is very different from what is generally supposed. It is a true principle in language, that we must determine the idea of the writer by the words he uses. Now if Gehenna necessarily means a place of unending woe, it could not be questioned but what the Bible taught eternal misery; as the real issue is on the meaning of the word itself; and we have before said, it properly means the valley of Hinnom, southeast of Jerusalem. But here we are met with Mark 9: 44, where the word Gehenna occurs, and associated with the following expressions:—"Unquenchable fire," and "where the worm dieth not;" from this it is inferred that Gehenna must mean endless misery, because it is clothed with such symbols as to denote eternal perpetuity. As this is the strongest argument that can be introduced upon this point, we will notice these phrases upon which the argument rests.

1. "The fire is not quenched." It is presumed from this that the wicked will endure forever, because the fire is not to be quenched. But is this a sound principle? Does it follow, that because the fire is thus represented, that whatever is cast into it must endure forever? Were this a true position, then any combustible material cast into such a fire would last forever. But, says the reader, is there any example of such a nature? Certainly there is. We have a case in point in Matt. 3: 11, 12. Christ will "gather his wheat into his garner, but he will BURN UP the chaff with UNQUENCHABLE FIRE." Here the office-work of such a fire is clearly expressed. Chaff is combustible material, and yet it is to be burned with unquenchable fire. This, however, is symbolical of the wicked's final overthrow. I will now cite the reader's attention to a class of texts where the idea of destruction is conveyed, and in each case the fire is represented as not being quenched. Isa. 1: 29–31; 34: 10–14; 66: 24 Jer. 7: 17, 20; 17: 27; Ezek. 20: 45, 48 These examples will show the reader that wherever the phrase occurs, it is indicative of total destruction. Now, can we for one moment suppose that Jesus intended any other idea than that of death when he uses the expression to the Jews who had always so understood it from the Old Testament? Hence we claim it as a strong proof for destruction.

2. The worm dieth not.

This phrase was borrowed from Isa. 66: 24, and among the Jews was well understood. Around the fires of Gehenna worms were constantly feasting on parts of dead bodies which the fire did not reach; so between the fire and the worm there was a total destruction of all that was cast into Gehenna. The worm is in all places in God's word an emblem of death and mortality. Please examine the following texts: Job 17: 14; 24: 20; 19: 26; Acts 12: 23. The worms lived around the fires of Gehenna, and consumed what was not burnt by fire; hence both these symbols are against the idea of enduring pain in hell. Now, inasmuch as the fires of hell were clothed in such figures, and for over 1000 years everything that had been cast into it had been destroyed, can we suppose that Jesus intended to convey the idea of eternal suffering, when such a figure had always conveyed an opposite idea? Hence it is evident that Gehenna, wherever used by the Savior, was in harmony with the idea entertained by the Jewish nation, viz., Destruction.

Therefore, we conclude, that Jesus in Matt. 10: 28, when speaking of casting the wicked into Gehenna, meant to convey the idea of death. And indeed he says "Fear him, who is able to DESTROY (not keep alive) both soul and body in hell." Hence soul and body were to be DESTROYED in this Gehenna, and not tortured forever. And this position is in harmony with the whole Bible, which represents that the wicked will experience,—

1st. Death. Rom. 6: 23; Ezek. 18: 4; Rom. 7: 5; James 1: 15.

2nd. Will be destroyed. Job 21: 30; Psa. 5: 6; Heb. 12: 29; Matt. 7: 13; Acts 3: 23; Phil. 3: 19.

3d. They will perish. John 3: 15, 16; 2 Pet. 3: 9; Psa. 37: 20; 73: 27; 2 Cor. 2: 15.

4th. Lose life. Matt. 10: 39; John 12: 25; Mark 8: 35.

These proofs are sufficient to show that when the wicked are cast into hell, they will not endure forever, but must cease to be. Psa. 37: 10.

We ask the candid reader, if he can behold anything in the text which we have briefly examined, that proves endless suffering in the regions of hell? Or can you find any such idea as that the soul is immortal, and will live forever? It seems to me you cannot. We leave the subject for your candid consideration, hoping that we may gain life through Christ.—Gospel Banner.

For the Crisis.

Free Tract Distribution.

For the past year little has been said through the Crisis upon this subject, and little has been done about it. During the year I think I have only issued one new Tract,—"Spiritual Evil,"—a thing unprecedented in my history for several years past.

When the Christian Publication Society was organized a year ago, I supposed, from all I knew about it, that its leading object was the publication of Tracts and Books adapted to the demands of the age in which we live. As President of the Society, I ought to have known what its object was. I hoped then that something would be done at once, in this direction. Indeed, I had supposed that the members of the Society intended to have raised the needful funds, possessed themselves of such Tracts as were now in circulation adapted to their wants, and issued other new ones, thus saving labor by consolidation, and furnishing publications freely to the poor, and cheaply to all who sought them.

To further this object, I was quite willing to transfer my own Tract plates and Tract publishing,—a business which has consumed more than eight years of my life, and which had just now reached a paying point,—to the Society at less than what I regarded as a reasonable price. I had also entered into arrangements with a New York publishing house to issue my Books, and was intending to retire from the business and recruit my shattered health and wasting energies, by a year of comparative rest: hoping that, meanwhile, the work of publishing might go on with increased energy, and the needy might be supplied with tracts and publications. My sense of propriety of course prevented me from urging a society, of which I was the president, to purchase tract plates of which I was the owner. I also refrained from appealing for aid for the "Tract Fund for the West," as I wished to use up the amount of funds on hand, and then turn the whole over into the hands of the Publication Society. After waiting some six months, and finding little done in this direction, I undertook to resume my labors and report the state of the "Tract fund," but was prevented from doing it. It has not been without much regret that I have seen time, precious time, passing, hard times approaching, and but little effort made in the way of issuing publications calculated to alarm a slumbering world to the certainties of coming doom, and prepare the church for her duty in this hour of peril. Unwillingly have I remained inactive, and pondered in what way I could best serve God, and benefit man, in peaceful diligence, away from the clamor of contention and the disputing about "divers and strange doctrines."

When I commenced publishing tracts, I had two grand reasons for it. First: I wished the tracts for my own circulation where I labored, and I could not well obtain them in any other way. Second: I knew then of no regular paper that could be recommended to enquirers, which was not liable to be at times defiled by ungodly personalities and strifes about men and measures; or else, which was not liable to have every truth which it taught contradicted on the other side of the page, by some one who loves "a free paper," who rejoiced in the freedom thus afforded by it, and who used it to the extent of their ability. With a view then to publish truth without tacking lies on to the end of it, hoping to make my "pottage" without having anybody's wild gourds in it, and desiring to deal out food that should not cause the cry, "There is death in the pot," I engaged in the issue of tracts.

I am not yet thirty years old. I have been employed in this work more than eight years, beginning without means or backers, and carrying it on without one solitary resolution or word of approval from any society, conference, or association of men whatever; without any subscriptions (except lately for the Tract Fund for the West); without any salary except the bounty of Him who feedeth the ravens; without any pledges, or promises of support from any one but the Lord. I have still been enabled, through God's good providence, to issue, as near as I can determine, more than twenty thousand Books, over fifteen thousand pamphlets, more than four hundred and eighty-eight thousand Tracts, besides some sixty-five hundred circulars and advertisements; making, if I have reckoned rightly, five hundred and twenty-nine thousand different publications that I have manufactured, or purchased editions of, of which about four hundred thousand have been from my own pen, and most of the others have been revised and edited by me. The needful work involved in these issues, has not been delegated to others. I have had no partner, or clerk, for any length of time, and nearly all the labor, (aside from the actual work of manufacturing,) from the writing, editing, and correcting for the press, to the distributing, counting, mailing, packing and billing them, has been performed by "these hands" that "have ministered to my necessities and to those that were with me." If any one thinks the labor small, they may try it.

When I add to this, the preparation of over a thousand foolscap pages of unfinished manuscripts, (to say nothing of some thirteen hundred pages of reported sermons,) which are yet waiting time and means for their issue; the writing multitudes of articles for various religious papers; traveling at times six or seven thousand miles per year; preaching constantly, and sometimes from nine to fifteen times per week; visiting almost as much as a doctor; giving as much advice as a lawyer; writing as many letters as a merchant; buying, selling, and distributing as many books as a colporter; caring also for my own and my father's family; besides taking the common amount of imposition, slander, and abuse, from hypocrites, sectarians, and ministerial rascals, I am not surprised that a constitution, naturally slight, fails beneath the pressure, and I am forced to rest, or die. My physicians reached this conclusion long ago; and I was no such a fool as to deny the fact; but, entangled by the circumstances of my position, I kept on, like a man floating above Niagara Falls and calculating with mathematical exactness just how near he could go and yet reach the shore in safety.

But friends have said, stop and rest. I mean to, but I want some others to go to work first. Then I can rest more quietly. The calls for light on every hand do not allow me to rest in quiet, while nothing is done; and I shall continue for the present my regular issues of tracts as before, selling to all who will buy, and giving to all who ask for them, so long as they last, trusting in God for the means of issuing more.

I had indeed about concluded that I must continue to press this work single-handed and alone, but at last I am cheered by some prospect of concerted action in the matter on the part of the Christian Publication Society. I had resigned my office in that Society, not wishing to be the [illegible] neither pleasure, profit, or honor, and not caring to mention an imperative policy which promised few desirable results. I find myself however again installed in the Chair, and am happy to report some signs of progress in the matter of publication. At a recent meeting of the Society it was voted to issue a call for tracts for publication, and another call for funds to publish them. The reader will find them in another column. A subscription has been started to raise FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS for this object. The Society are in earnest, as appears from the way they put their hands in their own POCKETS. The officers work for nothing and find themselves, (as I have done for years while issuing tracts,) and in this way they will, it is hoped, be able to issue tracts cheaper than any tract society in the country. Times are hard, and we feel their pressure like others, and are not free from debts and pecuniary difficulties. But we must work amid difficulties or not work at all.

Now, brethren and sisters, take hold of the matter. There is money enough among the readers of the Crisis to raise the $500 in one week. If you will take hold of it promptly, we will show you that a little money will go a great ways in publishing truth to the world. There is a special call now for publications. The times are ominous. Many, long locked in slumber, wake with the startling cry, "Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night?" Let the honest and truthful answer be given, and let the many-tongued press proclaim it far and near. We live amid the mighty rush of those majestic events which portend the coming of the great and terrible day of God. Let us discern the signs of the times. Let us take heed lest eating and drinking and worldly cares over-charge our hearts. Let us sell and give alms, providing for ourselves bags that wax not old, a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, where no thief approacheth, neither moth corrupteth. Let us walk honestly as in the day. May God bless us all with grace, and faith, and love, is my prayer. He that driveth the nations asunder, is rising up to "shake not the earth only, but also heaven." The world are all in terror; none can feel secure but those whose faith grasps the immovable kingdom, and who have grace to serve God acceptably with reverence and with godly fear. Men call for light. Soldiers in camp send for tracts and receive them eagerly. Men who gaze upon the gathering omens of the coming storm ask, "What shall be the end of these things?" Watchmen, long be-slept, wake with a sudden start, and find that the old stereotyped cry of "All's well—peace and safety" is out of date entirely. Nations sail in narrowing circles around the vortex of perdition. The tacklings are loosed, the vessel trembles, and quivers, and groans at the pressure of awful forces which control it, but makes no headway to the port of peace, the realm of rest. The mariners are affrighted, for the sea is rough, and stormy winds career along the boiling deep. O that He who now prayeth upon the far-off mount of light, may soon be seen coming in this last watch of the night, so full of sorrow, toil, and tempest, treading upon earth's rude and angry waters, pushing the billows in silence as his word, saying, "It is I, be not afraid;" and when He shall stand within humanity's sinking bark, "immediately," like the vessel of the disciples of old, the ship will be "at the land whither" we are going. May God bring us safely hither in his own good time, is the prayer of your brother in Christ.

School of the Prophets.

BRO. GRANT:—I have of late thought considerable of the benefits that would be realized by the church in having some of the pioneers and scholars amongst us open a school, or class, for the benefit of those who feel it their duty to proclaim to the world the kingdom at hand. We have long seen the evils that have resulted from the works of men who have gone out imagining they had a call to preach, without the sanction of the church, and it is doubtful whether they have the approval of the Master. But they are in our midst, and generally foremost in vociferations, and the loudest in denouncing every thing that appears like system and order in matters relative to the church. There is, however, one consolation in relation to this; the church has of late years had its eyes opened to the evil, [illegible]

Our Grove Meeting.

Some, I suppose, are anxious to hear about the Pleasantville grove meeting. Well, it was a heavenly season; not only to me, but to all of the dear children who attended. O what a united little company! I never saw such union before. There was not an unkind word fell on my ear from the children during the meeting. Monday evening came, and the moon peeped through the trees upon a little group gathered to hear the word. I talked to them about the blessed hope, showing the mercy of God in making his foes his footstool, instead of keeping them wailing in a lake of fire eternally. I saw that the devil was getting in a rage, which confirmed me in the faith that God was going to work. I felt just as calm as though nothing was going on. They threatened to break up the meeting. I told them we had not hired any officer to keep peace, for the God of Jacob was our peace-maker and watchman. Tuesday evening, preaching upon the necessity of adding to our faith virtue, knowledge, patience, etc., which was meat in due season.

Wednesday morning, Brn. Pratt and Hicks came. We had a happy meeting. Being cloudy, we had meeting in the house in the evening. Bro. Pratt preached about taking up the cross, which lay in believing present truth. It was so convincing that it brought one, who had formerly been a persecutor, upon his feet. He sat beside me, and I was surprised when I heard him cry, "Amen." He acknowledged that he heard the truth that night. I wish I had that sermon in a little pamphlet; it was too good to be lost.

Thursday, the grove echoed with the praises that flowed from the hearts of the little flock. In the evening Bro. Pratt preached on the prophecies. The Spirit attended the truth, and many wept before the meeting closed. We had some real good, old fashioned, apostolic prayer meetings. There was a oneness among the brethren in contending for the faith. In the evening, Bro. Pratt preached to a large congregation; the seats were filled, and some stood up.

Sunday morning, Bro. Pratt had uncommon liberty while talking upon the seals, and showing the position that the bride would be in, when the Bridegroom comes. He ran over the old track and showed the position of the wise and foolish virgins. One old Quaker, whose heart the Lord had touched, seemed as hungry for the truth as Pharoah's seven ill-favored kine. The tears ran down the old man's cheek as he received the truth. In the afternoon, Bro. Pratt talked to quite a gathering, considering the weather, showing that deliverance is very near. I wish those who are looking for him, with their great possessions, could have heard him. In our evening meeting, it rejoiced my heart to see how solemn the congregation appeared. They appeared as if they were chained to the seats. They seemed unwilling to leave the ground after the meeting closed.

For the Crisis.

No. Dana Conference.

Bro. Grant:—Thinking that God's children would like to hear from the conference held at North Dana, I pen a few lines for their benefit. The meeting commenced very unfavorably, the weather being rainy. At the Union church, on the evening of the 9th, preaching by the writer, from Heb. 9:27, 28. The second day, prayer meeting at 2 P. M.; preaching at 7 P. M. by Eld. S. P. Babcock, from Rom. 11: 34. Third day, prayer and conference at 10 A. M.; preaching at 2 P. M. by the writer, from Isa. 43: 10; preaching at 7 P. M. by Eld. S. P. Babcock, from Gal. 5: 1. Fourth day, preaching at 2 P. M. by Eld. S. P. Babcock, from Eccl. 3: 17; at 7 P. M., preaching by Eld. Geo. Champlain.

Sunday, the Methodist preacher invited Bro. Babcock to preach for him, which he accepted, and gave us an able discourse from Dan. 10: 21, showing that the Scriptures of truth noted the second coming of Christ, and that it was at hand. At 2 P. M. Eld. Geo. Champlain gave us one of his stirring discourses from Matt. 17: 18, showing that Christ was the way, and none can get eternal life by any other. A large congregation listened attentively. As the house was engaged in the evening, we removed to Gibb's Hall. Notwithstanding there was another meeting in the place, we had a good congregation, which listened attentively while Bro. C. spoke from Luke 23: 42, 43. At the close, some twenty-five partook of the Lord's Supper. Scarcely, in our short life, did we ever witness a more solemn time. Bro. Champlain continued meetings through the following week and over Sunday, the 20th.

Thus ended the first meeting of the kind ever held in this place. How much good was done is yet to be told. It was evident that prejudice gave away, and the influence of the meeting is somewhat extended into other places. May the blessing of God rest upon the truth, and water the seed that has been sown.

Brethren, let us arouse and gird on the armor anew, and enter the battle field with new zeal, not shunning to declare the whole counsel of God, whether men will hear or forbear. The night is far spent, the day is at hand. Let us contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints, and be found giving meat in due season, honoring and glorifying God.

Your brother, patiently waiting for the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen. Geo. A. Streeter.

The World's Crisis

AND

SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, Nov. 20, 1861.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

Hereafter all letters, communications, remittances and orders for the World's Crisis are to be directed to ELDER MILES GRANT, Boston, Mass.
H. L. Hastings, President C. P. S.

To Our Patrons.

It is well known that it has been from the first a standing principle with the conductors of the Crisis to never tease, dun, or beg, for its support; trusting rather to the christian fidelity of its subscribers to do what in their own judgments they as well know needs to be done, as they would if harrassed by editorial duns every seven days. But as God works through means, it may not be improper to remind our readers that we are in the midst of financial whirlpools and perils that endanger almost everything resting upon a financial basis. But if our subscribers will act promptly with reference to this matter,—now, while they have the subject in mind—say those who are in arrears and those who are not, it will be a very easy matter to place our family paper beyond all dangers of this sort.

In return, it will be our ambition to furnish weekly a religious family journal, that shall be unsurpassed, if not unequaled, in its intrinsic value. We feel confident that we occupy a position, and have at our command the requisites that warrant us in this proposition. Never did the world teem with so much of public interest as to-day; and what to us is vastly more than all else, is the fact, that never was there so much to stimulate our faith in the speedy coming of our Lord as is seen to-day. This evidence, we feel, must be held before our readers. We love His appearing; and the heralding of that appearing and warning men is the work to which our lives are devoted. With the facilities at our command, we shall aim to let nothing pass unnoticed that might interest or profit our readers; aiming with every grand fact that occurs in the drama, to show its niche in the page of prophecy, and thus contribute our quota to confirm the faith of those waiting the coming of our Lord.

With the liberal policy framed at Worcester and adopted by the conductors of the Crisis,—the able contributors whose productions we shall publish from week to week,—and the rich and carefully selected summary of news which we propose usually to place with every issue before our readers, we shall believe that the Crisis, for its intrinsic merits, will be the paper,—and just the paper—suited to the wants of the thousands of Adventists in the United States and Canadas. We desire it should be remembered, that this paper is not to serve the interests of a narrow party clique; but is placed upon the broad basis of a free paper, where every doctrine, not rendered effete by age and over-much discussion, or vapid by its transparent shallowness—(for liberty must not be abused)—can be fully and fairly examined.

We repeat therefore that our ambition will be to make this THE paper for the thousands who desire at once a journal of prophecy and a good religious family newspaper. We ask then for the co-operation and support of our patrons. We desire to see our subscription list doubled; and with an earnest effort on the part of our subscribers we believe it can be done. Bear in mind,—neighbors are now prepared to read with reference to the coming crisis as never before. They need this very journal in their families. Brethren, shall we not have your help in this cause? Can you not, and will you not, with your own subscription, immediately send us a club of new subscribers?—M.

A Traveler's Notes.

Thursday, Oct. 24th, we took passage in the cars from Boston to Worcester. The evening was spent very pleasantly in Bro. Ayres' happy family, made doubly so at this time, as it was the occasion of his union with a lovely bride. His is a pleasant home, where christian pilgrims find a welcome. Bro. A. has been making efforts to awaken his fellow men to a sense of their danger, and trying to persuade them to prepare for the coming of the Son of man.

Friday 25th. Last night we had our first frost which had power sufficient to injure the vegetable creation. Autumn thus far has been unusually warm and pleasant. The leaves of the forest trees have ripened and exhibited their beautiful colors without the aid of "Jack Frost." This is a very rare occurrence. It has been thought by many that the frost caused the rich color of the leaves in autumn, and was the cause of their fall; but it is now demonstrated to the contrary.

At ten o'clock, we departed from W. for Plainville, Ct., where we found another good home at Bro. Geo. Morgan's. We were rejoiced to find him anxious to have something done, if possible, to save the people in this pleasant village. War, and other worldly matters, seemed to engross the thoughts and conversation of almost every one. We had meetings Friday and Saturday evenings, and over the Lord's day. The interest increased rapidly, and on Sabbath afternoon and evening a crowd assembled to hear the evidences of the speedy coming of Jesus, and some of the proof that man has no inherent immortality. Several asked questions, which added much interest to the occasion. One objected to the resurrection of the dead, because there was not matter enough in the earth to make up the bodies of all who had lived. We replied that the earth was, without doubt, as large before the creation and death of man as it is now; remarking also that most of those who have died are in our burying grounds, which cover but a small portion of the earth's surface. He also asserted that the rocks are made of the bones of men. Sad as is the fact, it is often amusing to see what absurd positions men will take, rather than admit the plain truth of the Bible. They would be glad to see that good book trampled in the dust. The haters of God and his word are continually growing bolder; and, as Paul has stated the case, when speaking of "the last days," "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived;" and the tide of infidelity and wickedness is rapidly rising, with no prospect of abatement before Jesus comes.

Monday, Oct, 28th, we visited Winsted, and in the evening enjoyed the privilege of listening to a good practical sermon from Bro. Wm. Fenn. It was short enough to have time for an excellent prayer meeting at its close, and then get through in season. We have not been in a better meeting in a long time. The brethren and sisters in Winsted are doing well. The Lord is blessing them. When we inquired for the reason, we found it the same as in the case of all other churches and individuals, where we see a similar result,—they had been trying to do some good to others, and were at peace among themselves, dwelling together in love, "in honor preferring one another." No church can be prospered in any other way, because this is the only right one; hence, if the Lord should bless a church or individual who was pursuing an opposite course, he would be giving countenance to what was wrong, and thus deny himself, and become partaker in their wickedness.

Those wishing to send appointments to this church, can write to Walter Stickney, Winsted, Ct.—G.

Obituaries.

It is desirable that those who write obituaries for the Crisis should not send us very lengthy ones, as we have not the room to spare. We are aware, that whatever is said concerning the deceased is read with special interest by the surviving relatives and friends; while to the great mass of our readers, it is quite otherwise; unless it be some one more generally known. We should not need to mention this subject but from the fact that we are not able to publish all the obituaries as fast as we receive them. Death seems to be doing an extensive work among the children of God. We have now on hand nine obituaries. Our rule will be to publish them in the order of the dates of their deaths, instead of the time we receive them. In obituaries, let every word be of importance, then are they valued still more highly, and preserved by the friends with greater care, as valuable keepsakes.

Hints to Contributors.

As those who write for papers are ever anxious to have their contributions as acceptable as possible, we venture to give a few hints relative to the preparation of their copy.

1st. Have something to say.

2. Express your ideas plainly, in as few words as possible.

3d. Do not use pale ink.

4th. Leave about one inch margin at the left hand of each page.

5th. Dot your i's and cross your t's.

6th. Write a very coarse and plain hand.

Editorial Notice.

Pathology of the Reproductive Organs, embracing all forms of Sexual Disorder.—By Dr. R. T. Trall. The Sexual Organism and its healthful Management.—By Dr. J. C. Jackson.

This new and valuable work contains five hundred and forty-one octavo pages, half-Turkey binding, and a fine likeness of each of the authors. It is a book for the times, and should be in every family. But few men are as well prepared to speak upon the subjects treated in this work as Dr.'s Trall and Jackson. They have had long and successful practice, and stand at the head of very noted health institutions.—The work is published, and for sale by B. L. Emerson, 112 Washington St., Boston.—Price, for which it will be postpaid to any part of the country, three dollars.—G.

The Papacy Waning.

"But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end."—Dan. 7:26.

If we do not greatly mistake in reading the indices of the times, Rome, "The Eternal City," the proud "Mistress of the world," gives the most sure indications that its end is near. In coming to so grave a conclusion, we are guided, first, by the infallible Word of God, and second, by the present signs of the times.

The saints, with power to change times and laws, "shall be given into his hand until a time, and times, and the dividing of a time," or twelve hundred and sixty years. Says Gibbon, "The power around which the history of Europe arrayed itself for twelve centuries, was the papacy." But with the reformation under Luther, and the disastrous events that happened to this power during the French revolution, there commenced a decline that well nigh came to its terminus in the revolutions of 'forty-eight,' and now seems beyond remedy. In 1796, Napoleon inflicted a mortal wound upon the pride of the pontiff, by crowning himself and the Empress Josephine. In 1798, Pius VI. was taken prisoner by Berthier, and the tri-colored flag hoisted over the battlements of Rome. On the 5th of July, 1809, Pius VII. was called to share a fate similar to that of his predecessor. Arrested by order of Napoleon, he was hurried with the utmost dispatch as a prisoner for confinement in France.

With the reaction that followed the French revolution, the Pope was again found in the Vatican, but permanently divested of the temporal glory he previously possessed. From this point, whatever progress it might claim—for it must prevail against the church "until the Ancient of days come"—it was a progress against a silent, but increasing popular abhorrence, that, in the end, like the belching forth of a volcano, it can no more withstand, than could a man withstand a falling mountain.

In 1848, the Pope was again driven from Rome, seeking rest as an exile at Gaeta. This was with what the democrats of Europe called "the demonstrative shock." But how much more to be dreaded by the Romanists, is the demonstration so imminent to-day. Grand and awful must be the scene, when what is seemingly contemplated by rulers and people is brought to its consummation:—the Pope dethroned, perhaps slain, and Rome probably in ashes. Although the last point may not as yet be found in their programme, yet, if we mistake not, it is found in that written some eighteen hundred years since, by one St. John, on the Isle of Patmos. Rev. 17: 16.

All classes are speaking of this matter. Nor does it appear that Romanists themselves are wholly insensible to the magnitude of the event that threatens them. Mighty things have already been achieved by Victor Emanuel and Garibaldi, so that Italy is to-day comparatively free. Bibles are sold freely in the streets of Rome by humble colporters, while Emperors and princes are discussing the propriety and practicability of the Pope's holding temporal as well as spiritual power. They have an idea that the two do not properly "mix." The "Christian World" says, "Still more important is the discussion of the subject in the national legislatures of France and Sardinia, or rather what is the kingdom of Italy. The speeches of Prince Napoleon and Cavour have treated the question from the proper points of view, and have produced a great sensation in the Papal World, as is seen in the violent attacks which certain Roman Catholic prelates in France have made on the Emperor and his government. Some of the Italian prelates in the dominions of Victor Emanuel have been also very violent,—just as much so as they dare; whilst the Pope has betaken himself to the business of making 'Allocutions' on the subject."

Dr. Doellinger, of the University of Munich, has dared to open his mouth in opposition to the Pope's temporal power, notwithstanding the protest of the Pope's Nuncio. The Pope's own late chaplain,—"learned and illustrious"—has dared to do the same thing, for which he has been deposed and excommunicated with "book, bell and Bible." A book of the same character has attained a national fame in France. Louis Napoleon has been talked about as a candidate for pontifical honors. Much has been said of the Pope's having his future seat in Jerusalem instead of Rome.

Finally, we find no picture delineating in darker hue the present condition of the papacy than is found in the Pope's own statements. We take the following from "The Allocution—Delivered by our holy father, Pope Pius IX., in the secret consistory of Sept. 30, 1861."—"Thus, all divine and human laws have been trampled under foot; all Ecclesiastical censures have been despised; Bishops, with an audacity which increases daily, have been expelled from their own Dioceses, and even cast into prison; the greater part of the faithful people have been deprived of their Pastors; Priests, both secular and regular, have been crushed by ill usage and exposed to every sort of injustice; religious congregations have been destroyed, their members driven from their homes and reduced to utter poverty. Virgins consecrated to God have been obliged to beg their bread; and most venerated temples have been plundered, profaned, and changed into dens of thieves; consecrated things have been pillaged, Ecclesiastical authority and jurisdiction have been violated and usurped; the laws of the Church have been contemned and trampled on."

And again—"But that which causes us the greatest grief, Venerable Brethren, is, that sundry members of the Secular and Regular Clergy, some of whom were even invested with Ecclesiastical dignities, miserably hurried away by a fatal spirit of error and rebellion, and forgetful of their vocation and their duties, have strayed from the path of truth, have given their consent to the designs of the impious, and to the great regret of good men have become a stumbling block and a scandal." He likewise complains of the course of events in Mexico and New Granada; of their having "altars dispoiled," "Jesuits dispersed," etc. Yet he congratulates himself with the fact that the "Venerable Brethren, their Clergy and the Faithful take the liveliest interest in the extreme embarrassment which has been caused to us by the spoliation of the greater part of our temporal dominions."

In conclusion he gives an exhortation to faithfulness in prayer. "Meanwhile, let us not cease, Venerable Brethren, to invoke with all our heart, and untiringly, the all-powerful patronage of the Most Holy and Immaculate Virgin Mary."

"The Catholic" recently observed, "The state of Italy is changing from bad to worse." For ourselves, as Protestants, and as careful observers of the signs of the times, we hesitate not to say, we fully believe this is the saying that may continue to be echoed—"from bad to worse"—until like a millstone cast with violence into the sea, this mystic Babylon shall fall to rise no more. For it is written—"They shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it (his dominion) unto the end." And again of the kings of the earth it is written—"These shall hate the harlot, and shall make her desolate and naked, [a work seemingly well begun,] and shall eat her flesh, and BURN HER WITH FIRE." Rev. 17: 16.—M.

Notices of Tracts.

The Signs of the Times:—Words of Warning. By a Watchman.

A tract of four pages, full of scripture and most convincing extracts. Is worthy of a large circulation. May be had of the author, S. L. Manley, Newark, N. J. 1000 copies for $4. 500, $2,25.

Bible Teachings, in reference to some of the main doctrines of Christianity; Compiled by Isaac Dimmick, of Vermillionville, Ill.

This is a pamphlet of 24 pages. Seldom have we read a tract that more constantly impressed us with the thoughtfulness of the writer than in reading this pamphlet. Every sentence is pregnant with thought, giving the fullest assurance that the author is master of his subject. There are some expressions not so well suited to the taste of theological schoolmen as might be, as also some sentiments concerning the "age to come" that to say the least is more palatable as a common thing in the west than in many parts of New England. But upon the whole we call it a good tract, well worthy the pen of the Hon. Isaac Dimmick.

The Coming Conflict: With the inquiry, Ought Christians to bear arms? A sermon printed in pamphlet form, of 24 pages, by P. B. Morgan. Price 6 cts. single copy postage paid, or $3,00 per hundred postage unpaid. For sale by the author, Boston, Mass.

About a hundred copies of this work on hand. The question stated is thoroughly discussed, and now is the time to scatter this pamphlet.—M.

News.

As our readers are interested to know the progress of the American war, we purpose to furnish them with a weekly repast of the most reliable and interesting movements in the bloody strife. We should not do this, only from the fact that many of our readers take no paper but the "Crisis."

The great naval expedition which sailed the 29th ult. from Hampton Roads, has been very successful thus far. It has taken forts Beauregard and Walker, at the entrance of Port Royal, in South Carolina, and the town of Beaufort, which is about fifty miles in a direct line W. S. W. of Charleston, and sixteen miles from the sea, and has an excellent harbor.

The following description of Port Royal, published in the Boston Journal, will be read with interest: G.

PORT ROYAL AND BEAUFORT, S. C.

Port Royal received its name from the French, who planted a colony here long before the Pilgrims landed in New England. The name is appropriate, for it is the finest harbor between the Chesapeake and Cape Florida. The entrance is wide and free from shoals, with a beautiful clear channel and ample depth of water for any common-sized merchant ship to within two miles of Beaufort. From a friend who resided in Beaufort several months, we derive the following facts concerning the present condition of this interesting locality.

This town is about fifteen miles from the sea, on the south-eastern point of Port Royal Island, which is about a dozen miles in extent. The island, formed principally of a sandy loam, is high and dry, with good roads through it. The town is regularly laid out, with wide streets, and contains about a hundred and fifty decent houses, part of them elegant and capacious. Here resides the creme de la creme of the aristocracy of South Carolina. Here are the homes of the Barnwells, Haywards, Rhetts, Stuarts, Eliots, &c., constituting some twenty families, who look with a supercilious disdain upon every useful employment save only the planting of cotton. Nowhere on this continent is family hauteur and pride carried to such extremes as here. Nothing in our largest cities can equal the display of carriages and equipages with the servants in livery which may be seen here on a pleasant afternoon, when the mothers and daughters of these cotton lords take their accustomed airing. As no one dares to marry out of this exclusive circle, or has done so for two generations, all the leading families are related to each other, and some eight or ten family names embrace all the influence and nearly all the wealth of the town and vicinity. As a consequence of this state of society, the present generation have grown up with ideas more suited to the nobility of Europe than to those of Republican America; they look with disdain on the largest part of the world, and even upon the people of the adjoining States, and no language can express their bitter hatred and contempt for a native of the Northern States, more particularly those from Massachusetts.

With all its natural advantages, this is a place of no business as we consider the word. A few stores kept mostly by Jews, and a few small shops are all that remind one that the aristocracy have wants to supply in common with the rest of the world; the slaves make some purchases in exchange for the chickens and vegetables they are allowed to possess. During the fall and winter a few sloops pass up these sounds and rivers to convey cargoes of rice and cotton to Charleston, but during the long summers, weeks will pass away without the sight of a solitary sail larger than a plantation boat to relieve the monotony that broods over these otherwise beautiful waters.

As the island is encompassed by the salt waters, and is free from swamps and stagnant marshes, it has the reputation of an exceedingly healthy place. Situated on the parallel of thirty-two degrees, and at just sufficient distance from the sea to protect it from its damp atmosphere, the climate from October to May is delightful. No locality throughout the whole extent of our country can be pleasanter. The winter months here much resemble our pleasant month of October just passed. Here you may gather figs from the trees, and roses and other hardy flowers in the gardens at Christmas, and pluck roses again in March. During the coolest weather the waters swarm with a great variety of wild fowl, and fish and oysters at all seasons. Almost the only crops cultivated in this vicinity are corn for home use, and Sea Island cotton for shipment. This plant only flourishes within the influence of the soft and elastic atmosphere of the gulf stream. It is much more tender than the common upland variety, and seldom produces more than two hundred pounds to the acre on these old worn out lands. But it brings high prices—say thirty to forty cents per pound—and for many of the best brands sixty cents is often paid, with occasionally still higher rates. It is mostly purchased for shipment to France, where it is used for manufacturing fine laces, and contributes largely to the texture of the fancy silks, particularly the cheap ones for the American markets.

But the great value of the possession of this place at this time, is its peculiar adaptability for a great station for our fleet and army during the coming winter; with its deep, navigable waters and fine climate, it is certainly the exact point for the times. Isolated from the main land, with a sharp lookout from our gunboats and smaller steamers, there can be no danger of our being suddenly attacked, or our pickets being constantly murdered; and with the railroad from Charleston to Savannah—which crosses just above the head of the island, some fifteen miles from the town—in our possession, we cut off their communication between these important points completely. As there is a large extent of navigable waters in the vicinity, it will be easy to keep most of these extensive and well peopled islands completely under our supervision.

State of Europe.

During the present year, things have moved slowly in Europe, when compared with last season, and yet much has been accomplished by way of preparation for the coming struggle. The best informed men, who are closely watching the signs of the times, are fully convinced that a terrible war scene is sure to transpire in the old world at no distant date. The apparent quietude at present is like the stillness just before a terrible storm. The great men of earth are very much perplexed at the present aspect of things. Those who have cried "peace and safety" are astonished at what they now see and hear. Instead of preparations for peace, as they had hoped, all voices are for war. At the very point where they expected to see the commencement of the spiritual reign of Christ, or the beginning of the temporal Millennium, all things indicate that we are further from any such event than ever; hence, religionists, who do not study the prophets, are as greatly perplexed as politicians and warriors. A goodly number of ministers, however, who have formerly been looking for the conversion of the world before the personal coming of Christ, have now abandoned that notion, and are watching the signs of the times with great interest, while they are free to admit the present state of things in the world are giving strong evidence that the "last days" have really come.

When speaking of the present state of Europe, one of the leading journals remarks:—

"When we take a survey of the present condition of the European countries we can well understand the anxiety and perplexity manifested by their rulers. Never at any time in their history has so menacing a combination of adverse influences endangered their tranquility. The shutting up of the Southern ports has, by cutting off their supplies of cotton, tobacco and rice, thrown vast numbers of hands out of employment in England, while in France it has annihilated one of the most important branches of government revenue. There are in round numbers about five millions of people in England dependent, in one way or other, on cotton manufactures; and of these, by February next, the greater proportion will be in a state bordering on starvation. If already the cry of distress is beginning to make itself heard among these persons, owing to the mills working on short time, what will be the suffering when the exhaustion of the stock of cotton on hand compels them to stop altogether? And to aggravate the embarassments that are thus crowding upon the British and French communities, there are the further facts of the decline of their exports to America to nearly one-half their usual amount, and the necessity of their supplying the falling off in their grain crops by the importation of breadstuffs largely in excess of former years."

For the Crisis.

The Catholic Quarterly Review,

Edited by O. A. Brownson, for July 1861, gives an article of twenty-four pages on "Catholic Polemics," under the title of one of Prof. Hudson's books, "Christ Our Life." The first paragraph is given below.

R. W.

"At another time we might be disposed to give the work, the title of which we have cited, a thorough examination; for though its general doctrine is unsound, its author is a man of no mean ability, and, what is more, a man who ventures to think for himself, and really attains to some glimpses of truth. It is a work which cannot be uninteresting or uninstructive to those who wish to study the varying phases of thought among non-Catholics, or the struggles of a mind brought up in either old-fashioned Protestantism or modern Socinianism to obtain a doctrine which may at least be consistent with itself. But our purpose is different. We have selected the title of Mr. Hudson's book as a text, or an apology for a text, for some remarks of our own, having only an indirect and remote connection, with the subject which he treats."

This War.—Does it humble the people? lead them to confession, repentance and restitution? Or does God's terrible judgments tend to hardness of heart, conscience-searedness, lead to more ungodliness? Look abroad and see, has not intemperance, Sabbath-breaking, profanity, the love of gain, the clinging to the almighty dollar, increased since the commencement of this war? How can we hope for deliverance from God's judgments, the vial of his wrath so long as we stretch forth the arm of rebellion against the Most High, defy Omnipotence to arms?—Golden Rule.

☞ A pamphlet on Rome, issued in Paris, asserts that if the Papal Government persists in refusing the guarantees offered for the independence of the Holy See, the people of Rome must be appealed to, and if they elect Victor Emanuel King the French troops on the following day will be relieved by the Italian troops.—Millennial Harbinger.

From Bro. Hiram Munger.

BRO. GRANT:—While the elements of war are raging, I am quietly engaged at my old business, repairing a saw mill, as bad to get into effective operation as our government, and some churches that have caught the war spirit. Butchering and praying are trying to go in company—working for the government on Sundays to make the instruments of death; then on Thursday enter the church, and fast and pray for God to stay this curse brought on by national sins. The next Sunday work all day for the government, getting $2 per day for their patriotism; at every prayer ask God for grace to do his will and their duty to the government. This is about the way it goes, generally. A church, man, or nation, that takes such a course, will not see the prophetic light of the Lord's coming, and that day "will come on them unawares." Will He find faith on the earth when he comes? is a question.

There is to be a sifting time, even among us as a people. Some have the war spirit and fight. Some aid and encourage others to go. Some are speculating and hoarding up their money or laying it out for naught; while the watchmen that feel anxious to warn men must stop because the common poor are out of work, who have always supported the cause of God when they could. The rich or the forehanded have put two new purse strings on, for fear of coming to want. This state of things now exists among us. We shall soon know who are brethren and who are cousins. Many are calling for help that are poor. I would say, hold on to God, for the time is near when you will have to live by your faith alone. I would be glad to see you again, but if this state of things exists among our brethren, others will have to drop the trumpet and take the axe, unless they have a better faculty to beg than I have. I can repair the mill, but this state of things cannot be repaired.

From C. N. Buzzell.

BRO. GRANT:—Permit a pilgrim and stranger to say a few words to those of like precious faith, seeing time is short, and knowing we are to exhort one another as we see the day approaching.

First, let me say that there are a few up here among the mountains that love the Lord, and love his appearing. Yes, thank the good Lord, and I think I belong to this band. O how good the Lord is to those that love him! Four years ago last August, I enlisted under the banner of King Jesus; left my gay companions to go with a poor, despised company, called "Come-outers." Yes, I did come out, and as yet, have not had an opportunity to return, thank the Lord. O how often do I rejoice, when I think of the time Bro. L. L. Howard first came to Berlin to tell us about the Lord's coming. Though I was a wild youth, I could say, "that is truth." It sounded sweet to my ears. Glory to God, I loved it, and I have loved it ever since, and even more to-day than ever. O brethren, lift up your heads; the Master is coming to take his loved ones home. Amen and amen.

Berlin, N. H., Nov. 11, 1861.

Extracts from Letters.

BRO. I. H. LOMBARD, Livermore, Me., writes:—"The prospects of the cause wherever I have been this fall, and from all I can gather from all parts of the State, are really encouraging."

BRO. HOMER A. KING, Milroy P. O., Oct. 19, '61, writes:—"I expect to remain here until spring, when I intend, if my health permits, to go out scattering books and tracts, and saying what I can for the Advent cause in Ill. I shall go with my own conveyance; have no family to support, and wishing to lay up my treasures only in heaven. I shall be glad to receive invitations from those who have no money to pay for preaching. We have no preaching here now, and the church is open to traveling preachers of any denomination. They have requested me to act as leader in the prayer and conference meetings. I wish that some of the preaching brethren traveling in Ill. would call and preach to us the word of life. If they will write to me when they will come, I will circulate their appointments well, and meet them at and return them to the depot, if they come by R. R., and try and make them comfortable while they stay; but will not now promise much money. If you come by R. R., come on the Chicago and Burlington Road to Galva. Come 8 miles south to Centerville, and inquire for the house of Ambrose King. We live in Victoria Township, N. E. corner, Knox Co., Ill., Milroy P. O."

SR. KATE V. TEEPLE, West Bowdoin, Me., Oct. 6, 1861, writes:—"I have received the Crisis a long time, which I take great delight in reading, being away from those of like precious faith, as I am all alone in the faith of soon seeing our Lord in the clouds of heaven. It is all the preaching I have that seems like the present truth; for it contains more truth in harmony with the Bible than any other paper I know of. In this place there is much of the "war spirit" among professed christians, but, seemingly, very little of the spirit of Christ. How important it is that we all be followers of Jesus, that, when Christ who is our life shall appear, we may also appear with him in glory. Lord help us all to have pure hearts, is my prayer; for he is very soon coming to take such to himself, as we know by his words."

SR. H. P. CHASE writes:—We are still striving for the kingdom. The Lord is reviving his work here. O praise the Lord! Our troubles will soon be ended, our sorrows all gone, and we, if faithful, seated around our Father's table; and Jesus will be there. My health is very poor, and I desire that the children of God will offer prayer to God for me, that I may be healed, and at last have a seat with all the redeemed."

BRO. R. WILLARD, Summit Grove, Hammonton P. O., N. J., when speaking of the spread of the truth in his region, and of certain ones who have seen the light, says of Bro. F.:—"This dear Bro. F. became interested some ten years ago in the life and death views of scripture, and the truth has been sanctified to him, so that he is now a valiant soldier of the cross. He is a man of but few words, but thoroughly rooted and grounded, and quite exemplary at home and abroad, and probably may be doing more good than many professed teachers. Through his influence, several have been induced to send for the Crisis, and I trust are being made wise unto salvation. The Lord can make feeble instrumentalities valiant in the dissemination of his word.

He says—'Having two more names to send you for the Crisis, I embrace the opportunity to write you a little more and tell you that our good papers are much liked among some of their readers here. Mrs. C. has become a believer with us since reading them, and rejoices that she has found such guides to the truth. Mrs. M. says she likes them well, and believes in the personal coming and reign of Christ on the earth, but thinks persons have souls that cannot die. Others are anxious to hear our doctrines preached, and offer liberally towards supporting a minister. Bro. C. says he will give $200 a year for preaching once in two or three weeks. Mr. L. says he will give one hundred a year; two others say they will give $50 per year each, and I think there are several more who would contribute liberally. Those offering I think can be relied upon, and I think, without doubt, a minister could be well sustained here, and I hope our brethren will bear it in mind, that there is a vast field here, and no laborers at all.'

Now is there not some pious young Bro., willing to go to their relief? He speaks highly of country and climate; grains and fruits in abundance, &c."

C. BUNNELL, of Havana, Mason Co. Ill., Oct. 21st, writes:—"The Crisis is the only preacher in this part that gives us meat in due season. We hail the weekly visitor with joy; to read the letters and epistles of the brethren and sisters scattered abroad is heart-cheering and soul-stirring."

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep in South Kingston, R. I., Oct. 15th, Sister SARAH SLOCUM, aged 25 years and six months.

Our Sister Slocum formerly belonged to the Calvanist Baptist Church, but moving to this place some two years ago, she became acquainted with the great and glorious doctrines of the kingdom of God soon to be established under the whole heaven, and life and immortality only through Jesus Christ. Having embraced these doctrines, she wished to become identified with us in church fellowship. Accordingly she united with the church here at Rocky Brook last January. Since she has been with us she has shown herself to be an ardent and devoted laborer in the vineyard of the Lord, but being consumptive, her labors were soon to be cut short. For some two or three months before her death she was so feeble that she could not meet with us. Death finally seized her as his victim, but she yielded with the hope of obtaining victory over him at the resurrection. She leaves a husband, who mourns not as others who have no hope, but expects when the graves are opened and the dead come forth, to meet his wife again, never more to part.

Mourn not for her who calmly sleeps,
By earth's commotions undisturbed;
A nation groans, a country weeps,
Yet this by her is no more heard.

Beyond these scenes of angry strife,
Beyond death's dark and chilling flood,
All glowing with immortal life,
She'll rest, for she was loved by God.

C. F. D.

Also, fell asleep—prostrated by that fearful disease, diphtheria—at Rocky Brook, R. I., Oct. 18th, BENJAMIN, only son of our Brother Horatio N. Dickens, aged eight years.

Look on beyond this vale, brother;
We will there united be
With those that death holds now, brother,
O glorious thought to me.

May we range the fields of glory
With those jewels by our side,
And forever tell the story
That Jesus for us died.

C. F. D.

Died, in Sutton, N. H., Oct. 23, 1861, of chronic inflammation of the stomach, LOVINA R., wife of Albert A. Durgin, aged 33 years, formerly of this city.

Sister D. was baptized by Eld. J. Couch, in this city, about eight years ago, and since that time she endeavored to live a devoted christian life; her voice was often heard in the public congregation and in the social circle in vindication of the precious cause of Christ, and she often rejoiced that her Savior would soon come to give immortality and eternal life to them "that love his appearing." Many times would she give vent to her feelings by repeating Isa. 25: 8, 9.

As a neighbor she was highly esteemed, and will be greatly missed in the community in which she lived. Being possessed of a kind, generous and benevolent heart, and naturally of a strong constitution, her willing hands and feet were ever active in times of others' need. During her sickness of about ten weeks, though her sufferings were great, yet, with true christian patience and fortitude, she bore all till the last, committing her kind husband and two lovely daughters to the care and mercy of her God and Savior.

Her bodily sufferings were so extreme, that a few days before her death she entirely lost her eyesight; and while her little daughter Mamie, about six years old, stood by her bedside, she said, "Mamie, dear, I should like to see you once more, but I cannot till the resurrection!"

She wished her husband to tell all her friends and relatives that the religion and hope which she had cherished, and declared to others for the last eight years while in health, was now her strength and joy in her last conflict with death.

"Hope looks beyond the bounds of time,
When what we now deplore
Shall rise in full immortal prime,
And bloom to fade no more.

Cease then, fond nature, cease thy tears,
Behold the Savior nigh,
And when in glory he appears,
Thy joys shall never die."

The funeral was attended by the writer, and a discourse delivered on the occasion to a large audience, founded on 1 Cor. 15: 54,—"Then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." T. M. PREBLE.

Concord, N. H., Nov. 21, 1861.

Died, in Wolcottville, Conn., Oct. 14th, JAMES PETERSON, aged 50 years.

For a number of years Bro. P. lived by faith in Christ. By a righteous life he gained the respect of the community in which he lived, and by honesty and fidelity won the esteem and confidence of his employers. The day previous to his death he spoke in meeting with unusual earnestness and fervor, and remarked that he felt as though something strange was about to happen. On Monday morning he went to his work as usual, and very soon complained of pain in his breast. His employer took him home to his family, and within half an hour he was dead.

On Wednesday his funeral was attended in the M. E. Church. Remarks were made from 1 Cor. 15: 13–19. L. G. S.

Fell asleep in Jesus, on Thursday, Oct. 24th, 1861, JENNIE ELIZABETH, daughter of Marshall and Abigail Andrews of Palmer, Mass. The disease was diphtheria.

Little Jennie was a beautiful child of five summers. She belongs to that class referred to by our Savior when he said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." She is the child of believing parents, and as such is "holy." 1 Cor. 7: 14. It is the precious privilege of every christian parent to follow the example of the early disciples, who brought their "offspring" (Isa. 44: 3) to Him that he might bless them. Mark 10: 16. The tender-hearted Jesus would not have expressed himself so decidedly with reference to the little ones, had he not intended to assure us of the certainty of their salvation. "The righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe" covers also their children. "The free gift of God" which "is eternal life" comes on "the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them."

No child of a believer will fail of immortality unless it sins "after the similitude of Adam's transgression," and this cannot be done until it reaches the age of discrimination, or, in other words, until it clearly understands the requirements of the gospel, for "sin is not imputed when there is no law." Rom. 5: 13, 14.

It is the sacred duty of christians to "bring their children "up in the nurture and admonition of the LORD." Eph. 6: 4. What a responsibility rests upon christian parents! And yet how profound the apathy in multitudes of cases! How much of the prevailing disobedience to parents is owing to gross neglect on the part of heads of families, ministers and others!

Abraham's diligence in this great matter was, in the infallible judgment of Jehovah, worthy of especial mention. "For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord to do justice and judgment." Gen. 18: 19. JOSEPH T. CURRY.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the arrival of the Niagara, we have advices from Liverpool of the 2d inst., and Queenstown the 3d inst.

RUSSIA.

The London Times, in an editorial on Russian affairs, anticipates exciting times in that country ere long. It says things are moving on gradually, but decidedly, toward a very tremendous crisis, and the present policy is exactly that which ordinarily goes before great misfortunes.

ITALY.

Gen. Lamarmora had arrived at Naples to assume military command.

The name of Father Passaglia had been erased from the list of Professors in the Roman University.

LATEST.—(By Telegraph to Queenstown.)—Revolutionary movements are taking place among the students throughout Russia. Disturbances at Moscow were quelled by military force. A petition was being signed largely for a Constitution. Monster meetings of the people were expected on the return of the Emperor to Moscow.

SERFDOM AND EMANCIPATION IN RUSSIA.—There are among the Russian nobility some who possess from 70,000 to upward of 100,000. Count Schermetyeff is considered the richest nobleman in Russia. He possesses 120,000 serfs, amongst whom are several whose wealth amounts to millions. His annual income is estimated at a million and a half of silver roubles, (£250,000.) Every serf pays to his master from 10 to 15 roubles annually, so that the annual income of a possessor of 100,000 serfs cannot be less than £45,000, independent from the income he derives from forests, mills, fabrics, etc. The total number of serfs now in Russia is upward of 23,000,000, and taking the value of each serf at only 600 roubles (£50) the loss sustained by the owners by the emancipation is certainly not less than £1,150,000, or as half as much again as the national debt of this country. Taking the interest at five per cent., the loss of annual income to the nobility cannot be less than £67,000,000, or more than double the interest we pay for the national debt.

A letter from Constantinople asserts that a great schism is expected to take place in the Eastern Greek Church, a large portion of the Greek clergy endeavoring to bring about a union with the Romish Church on the condition of the preservation of the Greek ceremonial.

There is a new project on foot for uniting Europe and America by a telegraphic cable by the way of the Faroe islands, Iceland and Greenland. The proposed line is the one originated by Col. Shaffner, who has obtained from the Danish government all the necessary concessions required for carrying it into effect. It appears that the greatest depth between Orkney and the Faroe Islands, is 255 fathoms, between the Faroe Islands and Icelands 682 fathoms, between Iceland and Greenland 1540 fathoms, and between Greenland and Labrador 2032 fathoms. The aggregate length of submarine telegraph by the proposed rout will be about 1750 miles; land lines about 300 miles; making a total of about 2050 miles.

FOUR DAYS LATER.

By the arrival of the steamship City of Manchester, we have news from Liverpool to the 6th inst., and Queenstown the 7th.

Lord Lyons' and Mr. Seward's correspondence is criticised by the press generally. The criticisms are adverse to Mr. Seward. The Times says the American government is self-convicted of violating the rights of nations.

The Convention between France, England and Spain for intervention in Mexico was signed in London on the 31st of Oct.

The occupation of a portion of the Swiss territory by French troops attracted considerable attention. Switzerland had protested, and demanded the evacuation of its territory by the troops.

A treaty had been concluded between Prussia and China.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

BEAUFORT, S. C., IS TAKEN, in connection with FORTS BEAUREGARD AND WALKER, at the entrance of Port Royal.

Baltimore, Nov. 13. The steamship Bienville arrived at Fortress Monroe yesterday from Port Royal Sunday, with intelligence of the complete success of the naval expedition. Our loss was eight men and one officer, the chief Engineer of the Mohican. Forts Walker and Beauregard were captured.

The fleet arrived at Port Royal on Monday, the 4th inst. Tuesday the smaller gunboat sounded into the channel, under a fire from the forts, which did no damage. On Wednesday the weather prevented active operations, but on Thursday morning, 7th inst., the men-of-war and the gunboats advanced to the attack. The action commenced at 10 A. M., and was hotly carried on on both sides, and lasted about four hours, at the end of which time the rebels were compelled by the shower of shells to abandon their works and beat a hasty retreat. Our loss was eight men and one officer. The chief engineer of the Mohican was killed, and about 20 wounded. The rebel loss is not known. Fifty-two bodies were found by our men and buried. All their wounded except two were carried off. Two forts were captured, Fort Walker, on Hilton's Head, mounting 23 guns, and Fort Beauregard, on Bay Point, mounting 19 guns. The guns were of heavy calibre. The forts were both new and splendid.

Earthworks of great strength, constructed in the highest style of military science, and pronounced by our engineers as impregnable against any assault by land forces, have been erected. The final retreat of the rebels was a perfect rout. They left everything—arms and equipments of all kinds, even to the officers' swords and commissions, all the letters both public and private, order books and documents of all kinds were left in their flight, and fell into our hands, affording much valuable information.

Among the papers was a telegraph from Jeff Davis to the commander of the post, informing him of the sailing of the fleet and that he knew their destination to be Port Royal.

The whole surrounding country was seized with a perfect panic.

The force of the enemy was from 3,000 to 4,000 men, under Gen. Drayton of South Carolina.

The bombardment lasted between four and five hours, when the rebel flag on Fort Walker came down.

The rebel loss is supposed to be 200. Gen. Drayton commanded at Fort Walker and Col. Elliot at Fort Beauregard.

The rebels retired across Skull Creek, to a village 25 miles in the interior, where it is supposed they intend to make a stand. The negroes had already begun to pillage and destroy Beaufort. The white population had fled to Charleston by small steamers, by an inside route. Gen. Sherman has hundreds, perhaps thousands, negro laborers.

There was a panic at Savannah, and it is believed its capture would be easy.

New York, Nov. 15. The World's special Washington dispatch says Gens. Stone and Banks are in Washington.

A grand council of war is to be held to-day, which is to be participated in by Gen. McClellan, the President, and all the acting Major Generals. There is no doubt we are on the eve of great events.

Our spies and scouts report great disturbance in the rebel ranks, and the rapid moving of troops. There is also great activity in the army here.

The Herald's special Washington dispatch says that Mr. Dodge, Chief of the Police of Baltimore, acting under the Federal authorities, was here to-day (Thursday,) and reported to the War Department that information was brought to Baltimore this morning by the boat from Fortress Monroe, that Gen. Sherman had seized two million dollars worth of cotton in the vicinity of Beaufort, S. C., and that numbers of citizens there have professed loyalty to the government, and were soliciting arms with which to organize and protect themselves against the rebels.

Mason and Slidell taken Prisoners.

Fortress Monroe, Nov. 15. The U. S. steamer San Jacinto has arrived from the coast of Africa, via West Indies, where she has been cruising six weeks. Old Point was electrified by the tidings that she has now on board Messrs. Mason and Slidell, who were going abroad as Ministers of the Southern Confederacy to England and France. They were taken from an English steamer in the channel of Bahamas. The San Jacinto will soon proceed to New York with her distinguished visitors.

New York, Nov. 16. A Fortress Monroe special dispatch says "that Slidell and Mason were taken from an English mail steamer on the 8th inst., off Bermuda. Lieut. Fairfax and thirty-five armed men went aboard from the San Jacinto, with five officers, and picked out the commissioners.

They made a feeble resistance, but were induced to leave. The captain of the steamer raved and swore, and called the United States officers piratical Yankees, &c.

Eustis, one of the rebel secretaries also resisted, but himself and colleague accompanied their employers into confinement. Slidell had his wife and four children aboard, who were allowed to proceed to Europe.

St. Louis, Nov. 18. The Memphis Argus of the 16th has a dispatch dated Chestertown, 14th, which says that the Federal forces have possession of Pinckney Island, and have seized all the able-bodied men on the plantations on board the fleet. Others were fleeing. They have made no attempt to effect a lodgment on the main land.

The Memphis papers express great alarm at our preparations for an expedition down the Mississippi, and demand that the entire reserves of the country shall be brought to bear against it.

☞ Full returns of the late election in Maryland show about 30,000 Union majority to the State ticket, and the choice of 10 loyal and 1 Rebel Senator; and 66 Union to 6 Rebel Delegates. Can there be longer any doubt as to the loyalty of Maryland? It is stated that Gov. Hicks will call a special session of the legislature to undo the treasonable legislation of the last session.

A Call for Funds.

The publishing committee of the CHRISTIAN PUBLICATION SOCIETY, deeply sensible of the fact that the time is short, and that our work must be done soon, or not at all, venture this appeal to those interested in disseminating divine truth through the press.

We purpose to commence at once the publication of Tracts upon important Scriptural topics, of vital interest to the church of God in these times of peril and dismay. We wish to present to the household of faith "meat in due season." We wish to scatter light among the benighted of the earth, and so sound out the word of the Lord.

To do this on a scale answering at all to immediate necessities, we propose to raise at once FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, ($500) by special contributions, for this object. This money is designed to obtain and publish tracts, new and old, adapted to the times in which we live. We who engage in the work as publishing committee have no salaries or pay whatever for our services, and we mean that every dollar contributed shall tell in the great work. Each tract will be submitted to the careful examination and judgment of our Editorial Committee, H. L. Hastings, H. F. Carpenter and D. T. Taylor, in whose judgment, ability and prudence the churches can safely confide. Only such tracts as they shall approve will be published by the Society. We expect to furnish tracts cheaper than ANY TRACT SOCIETY in the COUNTRY, and our surplus, beyond the actual expenses of issuing them, will be devoted to the purpose of furnishing tracts for gratuitous circulation, or wherever they may be needed.

Brethren, will you help us in this work? Will you give us money? Or will you send us $100, $50, $20, or $10, to be repaid in TRACTS, at cheap rates, when you shall choose to order them? We wish this work to move on at once. We therefore call for $500, and pledge ourselves to see it used in a manner that shall tend to accomplish the desired object. We do not wish to divert the funds of the World's Crisis for this work, nor has its treasury sufficient money that can be spared for this purpose. We call upon all interested in publishing and scattering cheap Tracts, to contribute for this object. Will not preachers take hold of it? Will not churches make collections and remit them?

No fear need be entertained that the work will be delayed. As soon as a portion of it is raised, and tracts are prepared, it can begin, and each dollar added will facilitate the object and extend the operations of the society. Come, then, to the work. Send us donations, pledges, or loans, to be repaid in publications, in amounts from a hundred dollars to a widow's mite, and with them let your prayers ascend, that God's blessing may attend our efforts and crown them with success. Monies should be sent to Miles Grant, Editor of the World's Crisis, Boston, Mass.

The Tract should be plainly written, on only one side of the paper, (covering about 24 pages foolscap, in ordinary hand writing,) and the manuscripts should be accompanied by a sealed envelope containing the author's name. If more than one manuscript is retained, satisfactory payment will be made for the same. Rejected MSS. are to be at their author's disposal, and the committee may reject all if thought best by them.

A Liberal Offer.

Being satisfied that time is short, and that what is done must be done quickly; and feeling anxious to do what we can to arouse a sleeping world and church, we make the following liberal offer:—Any one who will send three or more new subscribers to the Crisis for six months or one year, with advance pay for the same, shall receive at wholesale prices, including postage, any of our books and tracts they may select, amounting to one-third the value of the money sent. For instance, if they send three dollars, they receive one dollar's worth of books or tracts; for six dollars, we send them two dollar's worth; for twelve dollars, four dollar's worth, etc. Let every reader take hold of the work in earnest, and help scatter tracts, books and papers like autumnal leaves.

MILES GRANT, per order of Publishing Committee.

For the Crisis.

Sabbath Morning.

"This is the day the Lord has made,"
Awake! my heart, to sing his praise,
Arise! my spirit, soar above,
And list to heaven's harmonious lays.

O morn! so beautiful and still,
My spirit sweetly quaffs repose;
Spirit divine! thy love instil,
Be near me to my journey's close.

Be near me when my feet draw near
Death's gloomy river, chill and cold;
Oh! then my fainting spirit cheer,
Then let thy love my heart unfold.

And when that dreadful day is come,
When all shall take their last reward,
Jesus, dear Savior, take me home,
To dwell forever with the Lord.

MARY.

Trust in God.

BY S. J. RIPLEY.

"It is better to trust in the Lord, than to put confidence in man."—118: 8.

David thought so with all his experience in prosperity. Even with such a friend as Jonathan, who never played him false, (and how few can say that of a friend! yet there are happy exceptions,) he leaves us this testimony. O, what an assurance to one that believes it! What a balm it is to the grieved and wounded spirit! We love to hear the servant of God as he talks of the way of life, as he opens to our view the great field of prophecy, and for the time being we enter with him, and revel in the glorious light of the future—or as he tells us of the narrow way, the necessity of keeping ourselves unspotted from the world, the importance of close watchfulness, of self-denial, of daily cross-bearing, or mayhap talks of the communion we may have with our heavenly Father, while our beating hearts respond to his words. And sometimes we may set them up for our examples, find ourselves trusting in them, leaning on them. They may be called to other fields of labor; Death may lay his icy hand on them, or what is worse, they may fall into open sin, and after they have preached to others, themselves become castaways. Our prop has failed, and we are drove to say with David, "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man."

Christian fellowship is sweet. O how the heart of the child of God is drawn out to the "little flock" that he has suffered and rejoiced with, passed through the same perils, battled with the same foes, sympathized with in sorrow, and hoped for the kingdom together! How the pure and fervent love burns in his bosom! What a help christians may be to each other. How much we need each other's sympathy and fellowship, and especially how invaluable, in these days of dissembling, is a faithful heart that dare speak to you of your failings, in love. But we are in a wicked world, surrounded with temptations; and sometimes christians err; perhaps a Judas is discovered in our midst; a "bone of contention" gets in, and there are some that will not endure; and amid the confusion and anarchy that sometimes follow, and we fear that even the jewels may be lost,—how sweet at such a time to have the blessed assurance, "It is better to trust in the Lord." With His strong arm laid underneath, every believer is safe; and with this mighty support, with simple trust, his head is kept above the waves. Though he has felt the blessedness of christian confidence, and still feels the necessity of it, yet while the storm rages, he can with confiding love exclaim with the Psalmist, "It is better to trust in the Lord." How liable we are in prosperity to lean on each other, and to forget that "the Lord is the strength of his people!"

There are lone ones that are struggling with discouragements, who rarely see the face of one that sympathizes with them in the "blessed hope; to such the promise comes, and when the heart takes in the blessedness of it, and applies it home, with what a sweet confidence they can come to their heavenly Father and say, "O Lord God, thou art my trust."

Friends die, or prove faithless, and our broken hearts feel round for a support on which to lean, and we are met with the assurance that "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man." We have the "better" to fall back on; and what a stronghold it is in every time of need! Surely, "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it and is safe"; and trusting in it we shall arrive at the goal, where we can say, "I will praise thee; for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation."

Time of Trouble.

Some think the "time of trouble" spoken of in Dan. 12: 1, has already begun. God has not left us without proof in this matter, and I think the evidence will show that we have not yet entered it. We read, "Michael shall stand up," &c., at the commencement of that "time of trouble." Now if that Michael is Christ, as we have always supposed, and if, he sat down at the right hand of his Father at the commencement of his being intercessor; then, when he rises up, or "stands up," he will shut the door. See Luke 13: 25. Then there will be no more a Mediator between God and man. Then they that have not got oil in their vessels with their lamps will seek it, Matt. 25: 8. Then there will be a famine in the land; not a famine for bread, nor a thirst for water, but for hearing the word of the Lord, Amos 8: 11. Then "he that is holy" will "be holy still," "and he which is filthy" will "be filthy still," Rev. 22: 11.

A time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation upon the earth,—unlike every other time of trouble, from the fact that all know Jesus is coming, and their account is not settled up, their sins are all out against them. O what a scene! Who can imagine it? Despair filling all hearts, excepting the "little flock." O father, what shall I do? O mother, pray for me! Husband, cannot you help? O wife, how I wish I had believed what you said! O saint of God, you must ask God for me! Brother, sister, is there no mercy? All faces are gathering blackness, while the little flock are exclaiming, "This is our God—we have waited for him." Sinner, this is something more than a fancy sketch. Its reality will soon be here. You will soon understand what it is to call for rocks and mountains to fall on you, to hide you "from the face of him that sitteth on the throne." Will you search to see if these things are so, before Michael stands up?

LAURA ANN WHEELER.

Hawley, Mass., Oct. 20, 1861.

P. S. After having penned the above, articles appeared in the Crisis rejecting the idea that Christ and Michael are identical; yet feeling that there is some evidence that they are, I thought I would annex what light I have on the subject, and leave it for the consideration of others. We read in Rev. 12: 7 that "there was war in heaven; Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels." It appears by this, that Michael has angels at his command, which implies he is something more himself. Again, in Dan. 9: 25, we find Gabriel calling Christ "Messiah the prince." And again, 10: 21, he speaks of Michael as "your prince"; 12: 1, as "the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people"; which may mean intercedes for them. We find in many places Christ designated as Prince, and this title is also applied to Michael.

The Judgment.

Christ will appear in the glory of his Father, with all his holy angels, coming in the clouds of heaven, while the world are reveling in their wickedness. Men shall now lift up their eyes, and see him coming in such majesty and glory as will cause them to cry for rocks and mountains to hide them from the face of Him who sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb, for the great day of his wrath is come. The sign of the Son of man appears in heaven, and all the tribes of the earth mourn; unexpected to them that awful day will come. "For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell upon the face of the whole earth." This will be a most unexpected sight to this wicked world; it will come suddenly upon them, as a cry at midnight; it will take them in the midst of their wickedness; it will at once break up their revels, their eating, drinking, and carousing. The world will be full of people, most of them wicked; they will be filled with dolorous shrieking and crying, for all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Rev. 1: 7. This sight will change the voice of their laughter and singing into mourning; from scoffing into hideous yells, ghastly terror and amazement, trembling and chattering of teeth shall seize upon them.

But with respect to the saints, it shall be a joyful and most glorious sight to them, for it will at once deliver them from all their enemies, from all suffering, and they will be delivered at a time of need, and of trouble and distress of nations with perplexity; at a time when men's hearts are failing them for fear, looking after those things coming on the earth. The saints will see the loving countenance of Christ and exclaim, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us."

The last trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised, and the living changed. The number of the dead is now very great, in the ocean as well as on land. In that great day, all of these shall rise. The graves shall be opened in all parts of the world, and the sea shall give up its dead; (Rev. 20: 13;) then all that have lived upon the face of the earth, all the church of God in all ages, Adam and Eve, Abel and Seth, Noah and Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the holy prophets of Israel, the holy apostles of Jesus, and all the saints of their times, and all the holy martyrs who suffered the cruel persecutions of papacy during the reign of the man of sin, and all the enemies of the church in all ages will appear. Wicked heathens and Jews, heretics, infidels and cruel persecutors, sinners of all sorts, and every man will be judged according to the deeds done in the body. The saints will ascend up into heaven, while their enemies behold them, and they shall be forever with the Lord. 1 Thess. 4: 16. While the burning day, that shall burn as an oven, shall burn up all the wicked that it shall leave them neither root nor branch.

Watch ye, therefore, and be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. We must be living in the immediate vicinity of the judgment day. Soon the die will be cast. Soon there will be no hope for a guilty world. Soon the battle of that great day of God Almighty will begin, if it has not already commenced.

We live in a critical moment. The judgment of the great day is upon us, with all of its realities, with all of its dreadful consequences upon the wicked. But the saints will be glad and rejoice.

Acrostic.

Enlisted soldier of the cross of Christ,
Defender of the precious faith revealed,
What glory waits thee in the future world,
If thou shalt faithful to the end remain,
Nor cease thy warfare when he comes again.

Behold the prize before thee! a rich crown
Upon thy brow shall rest of glory bright;
Reserved in heaven e'en now for thee it waits.
Nerve, nerve thee for the fight, "have faith in God;"
Heaven nears; the vict'ry and the crown are sure.
All hail! the Conqueror comes with his reward,
Make ready all to meet the coming Lord.

What is the Matter?

I find of late a general complaint of dull meetings among our people. What is the matter? There is a cause before the effect. One said to me a short time ago, "Our preacher is good, and labors too much in meeting; he preaches an hour and a half every sermon. We get tired out; then he finds fault with us for not giving attention. At prayer and conference meetings, he reads a long hymn, prays full fifteen minutes, then another long hymn is read and sung. Then he takes fifteen minutes in telling us what to do. It is then time to go home, and some go out. A few drag out another six verse hymn; this sets some to gaping, others to hitching, or whispering about going home; this discourages the preacher, and he takes fifteen minutes more to drub us down, then sings the doxology, and the sooner we get out the better." There are many similar instances to the above. Now I believe such meetings as these are worse than none, and such preachers had better be sawing wood. Our churches are dying for the want of exercise. A general may give orders till doom's-day, if the main body don't move there will nothing be done. There are some good preachers that are meeting-killers. Why not stay at home? It will be better for you, and the church. Your throat will get well much quicker. I found a church last month nearly dead. I preached thirty-six minutes, left forty for exhortation, thirteen spoke, and we closed at 12 o'clock. Had a revival in the first meeting, and all day. Why not turn over a new leaf, and learn a new lesson from the past.

Blankets for Soldiers.

I see the calls, and great activity displayed by the noble-hearted, generous women, to supply all the soldiers in the army with blankets, underclothes and socks, while exposed in defence of the country. In looking over their needs, and the patriotism so ready to relieve them, I thought I would inquire if there are not soldiers in the army of the Lord who are exposed by day and night, and who are really needy of the things which would make them comfortable, while on the march in this all-important campaign? Will not the well off, generous-hearted, big-souled women, interested in this peaceful struggle to restore the rightful reign to David's throne, see to it, and make special effort for the needy? A little self-denial would prove a great blessing.

Selections.

Will you Enlist?

A soldier, going along the road in his regimentals, overtook a serious-looking young man who was reading a hand bill. The young man was the taller of the two, but the soldier seemed to have the advantage on account of his high cap and feather. Presently they began the following conversation:—

"Marching is warm work such a day as this," said the soldier; "but you seem to clear the ground as if you were used to it."

"Why, when one has a distance to go," replied the young man, "there's no good got in letting the grass grow under one's feet."

"True, comrade; you look like a hearty young fellow that has got some pith in him, just fit to serve your country. What say you? will you enlist for a soldier?"

"No, that is not necessary, seeing that I am a soldier already."

"Indeed! Then let me tell you that it seems a queer thing to me that you are not in regimentals."

"It may; but the men in the company that I belong to are allowed to dress in what way they like, so that they go well armed, keep themselves neat and clean, and don't disgrace their profession."

"Ah! Never did I hear before that any regiment in the service was allowed to dress out of uniform. I am afraid you are joking; and yet you look as solid as old Time. How old are you? I take you to be about thirty."

"You are not far from the mark; but I call myself an old soldier for all that."

"May I be bold enough to ask if you have ever seen service? Have you ever been in an engagement?"

"Oh, yes, in a great many; and have been desperately wounded, too, in some of them. But, here I am, thank God, willing to fight as long as I have a leg to stand on."

"Well, that's right; you seem to have some heart in you, as every soldier ought to have. You can read, I dare say, or you wouldn't have that paper in your hand; and if you can write a bit, I shouldn't wonder if you were promoted, and made a corporal."

"I've no great desire for promotion; it's a soldier's business to do his duty cheerfully rather than to want to hold up his head above his comrades."

"Very true; but for all that I've no great wish to remain 'a full private' all my days. Come, now, be honest with me, for I think it's all moonshine about your company not wearing uniform. I fear you're a deserter."

"Not a bit of it. Many a thing have I done in my time that a faithful soldier ought not to do; but as to deserting, I'd lose my life first."

"Well, well, I'm not the man to betray a brother soldier, if you had been one; but I'm glad you're no deserter. Here's a hotel, I see; what say you to a glass of brandy and water?" or perhaps you like the brandy best clear?"

"I am neither in want of the one nor the other. In the first place, I can't afford to drink brandy; and in the next place, orders are given at head quarters that our company should be very moderate in such things."

"If you can't afford it you shall have a glass at my expense, and welcome. Moderation is all very well; but when a soldier is not on duty, he may take a drop now and then."

"But our company is ordered to be always on duty, night and day, wet or dry, in doors or out. We are ordered to keep guard continually, and to be always ready for the march."

"What! always on duty? Why, that's enough to break any soldier's heart. In time of war it's warm work with us, I grant you, and there's no time for carousing: but when we are at peace, and at home, as I may say, to be always on duty is quite out of the question. Look here, now; while we have been talking we have left the hotel behind us. But tell me, do you belong to the artillery, cavalry, or the infantry? You're tall enough for a life-guardsman."

"No; I belong to none of these."

"Tell me, then, what you are. Are you ashamed of your colors, or your captain?"

"Blessed be God, neither the one nor the other. No, no; if any soldier has cause to speak well of both, it is I."

"You seem to be an odd fish, comrade; you wear no uniform, and you won't drink brandy. It is not above ten minutes ago that you said your company were all to be well armed. Now, you have not so much as a bayonet by your side. If you are so particular about one part of your duty, how is it that you are so careless about another? I can't see how a man can be well armed while he goes about in citizen's dress, with neither musket, sword, nor bayonet about him."

"Why, the weapons we are commanded to carry are of a different sort from yours; and as to our armor, we wear that under our clothes. It has been found out that inside armor answers best."

"Has it? And how long may that be ago? Do you mean to say that you have got armor under your clothes now?"

"Suppose, before I answer your question, I read over this handbill, for it will explain the whole affair a hundred times better than I can do it. It will give you some account of the corps that I belong to."

"Then let us have it."

"You shall; therefore, 'Attention!' It runs thus:"

'Every true christian is a soldier; Christ is the Captain of his salvation; for God, who is over all the armies of heaven and the inhabitants of the earth, hath appointed him to be a "Leader and Commander to the people." He hath said, "Thou art my battle-ax and weapons of war; for with thee will I break in pieces the nations, and with thee will I destroy kingdoms." Every true and faithful soldier of Christ is bound to obey his Captain's commands in all things; and in order that he may do this, they are all written in a book. This book contains a full and particular account of his arms and accouterments, his exercise, and all his duties, so that no one can excuse himself on the score of ignorance. This book contains the Articles of War, the enemies he is to fight with, the way he is to begin his attack, and the manner in which he is to secure the victory."'

"I see, now, comrade, what sort of soldier you are, and wonder I did not find it out before; but go on with reading your paper."

"'He must be clothed with humility; he must have clean hands and a pure heart, and ever be ready to shed the best blood that runs through his veins in fighting against the world, the flesh and the devil. His weapons and his armor ——'"

"Ay, I'm glad it says something about them. Go on, comrade."

"'His weapons and his armor are not of forged iron and sharpened steel, but they are always to be kept fit for service, that he may be mighty in pulling down the strongholds of sin and Satan. On his head he is to wear the helmet of salvation, his loins are to be girded with truth, with the breastplate of righteousness over his heart. His left hand is to bear the shield of faith, his right to wield the two-edged sword of truth, and his feet to be shod with the preparation of the gospel.'"

"I know how to manage my firelock pretty well; and I think it would take a strong man and a sharp sword to cut me down; but such arms and armor as you talk about are new to me; how do you know how to use 'em?"

"Listen to the handbill. 'Thus armed for battle, his Captain teaches his hands to war, and his fingers to fight, and marches on before him, "terrible as an army with banners," conquering and to conquer.'"

"You're a long way beyond me. I should make but a poor soldier in your corps. There are two or three in our company like you, but I always keep away from them. If you have got any more in your paper, let's hear it; for, to tell you the truth, I don't care how soon you come to the end of it."

"There is but little to read now, but that little is worth your attending to. 'Every human being who is not a christian soldier, but a disobeyer of God's commandments, is a rebel and a traitor, for God is true Sovereign of all, being King of kings and Lord of lords, and is thereby entitled to the allegiance and service of all his subjects. He that serveth an earthly commander as soldier, and refuseth to be the soldier of the King of heaven, is a deserter from the standard of the cross, and lives a life of open rebellion to his lawful Sovereign. Heavy is the punishment of a soldier for disobedience to his commander, but heavier still for disobedience to the King of kings; for the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the people that forget God.'"—Amer. Tract Society.

"Deliverance will Come."

BRO GRANT:—The following lines are so full of truth and beauty, that it might be well to give them in our family paper, as they have not been seen by all of its readers. The spirit that moved the pen of John Bunyan must have presided over that of C. CATLIN when he wrote the excellent hymn I now offer for the benefit of many a "wayworn traveler."

MARIA.

I saw a wayworn traveler,
In tattered garments clad,
A struggling up a mountain,
It seemed that he was sad.
His back was burdened heavy,
His strength was almost gone,
And he shouted as he journeyed,—
"Deliverance will come!"

The summer sun was beaming,
The sweat was on his brow;
His raiment was all dusty,
And his step was very slow:
Still he kept pressing forward,
For he was wending home,
And he shouted as he journeyed,—
"Deliverance will come!"

The songsters in the arbors,
That grew beside the way,
Attracted his attention,
Inviting his delay:
His watchword being "onward!"
He stopped his ears and ran,
Still shouting as he journeyed,—
"Deliverance will come!"

I saw him in the evening,
When the sun was bending low,
He'd overtopped the mountain,
And reached the vale below:
His ELDER BROTHER met him,
His journey it was done,
And he shouted as it ended,—
"Deliverance will come!"

His eyes were dim and heavy,
His body weak and wan,
Therefore his Brother gave him
A couch to lie upon,
And closed the blinds around him,
And locked him up alone,
That nothing might disturb him
Till deliverance should come.

Hope made for him a pillow,
And faith a garment rare,
To wrap him in his slumbers,
Till Christ his home prepare:
And when the light of morning
Broke in his little room,
He rose and cried "Hosannah!
"Deliverance has come!"

Then I heard the song of triumph
His sung upon the shore,
Saying, "Jesus has redeemed me,
To suffer nevermore;"
And casting his eye backward
On the race that he had run,
He shouted loud in glory,—
"Deliverance has come!"

Backbiting.

In all its forms, backbiting is both mean and contemptible. It assumes no feature, but what is despicable and degrading. Yet, notwithstanding its meanness, there are hundreds upon hundreds who pretend to be very upright—some even professing to be christians—that are daily pouring forth vile epithets of slander upon their neighbors. It is a lamentable fact that all classes are, to a certain extent, guilty of this damnable conduct. From the lowest to the highest position in society it holds its sway. By some it is practiced clandestinely; by others, publicly. And while the latter do not care, the former would not for the world have a victim cognizant of their secret tattling. With strict injunctions of secrecy, they communicate their prejudices to their friends, thinking they will go no further; but in this they are mistaken. A victim of slander is generally aware of the fact. It is communicated to him either by his friends or the sneers of his enemies; and then, what must be the state of that man's feeling? Reader, imagine yourself in such an one's position—then, perhaps, you can form some idea.

It is a besetting sin for us to censure the faults of others; but, alas! how seldom we notice our own. It is an old and true saying, "All have their failings." Some, it is true, are worse than others, and if one should chance to err, we should use kind words, and endeavor to get him into the right track again. Such a course will exert a far better influence than all the harsh words that can be used. Human nature revolts at the sneers and taunts of men, and however firmly resolution may have been set for the better, the victim gives way to angry passions, and abandons his resolutions in despair. It is often the case when one is thus smarting under persecution, he flies to the wine-cup, with the hope of drowning his sorrows by intoxication. Soon he cares neither for himself or any one else. Goaded by sneers and hisses, and maddened by wine, from thence he plunges into houses of crime and debauchery, and there, perhaps, loses his life in some drunken row.

Reader, could you bear to have a hand in making such a picture? Surely not. Then avoid speaking ill of your neighbors in their absence. Should they chance to trespass against you, "return good for evil." "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.."—Millennial Harbinger.

THE HEART.—The heart is a city surrounded by many gates, and the devil knoweth it right well. We shut, bar, and lock him him out at one entrance, and forthwith he makes his appearance at another. Let us then be vigilant, for if he enters one gate, he is master of all.

CHARACTER.—As daylight can be seen through very small holes, so little things will illustrate a person's character. Indeed, character consists in little acts, daily life being the quarry from which we build it up, and rough-hewn the habits that form it.

☞ If you do good, forget it; if evil, remember and repent of it.

Youth's Department.

The Little White Angel.

Some children stood in a group before the door of the village school-house, one lovely summer evening.

They were all talking pleasantly together, from Kline, the son of the rich and proud Hoffmeister, to little blue-eyed Carl, the only child of the poor baker.

It is very true that Kline wore a velvet jacket, richly embroidered, while Carl's coat was old, and his wooden shoes were rough enough, in all conscience. But what of that? If they were good friends, what difference did that make, I should like to know? Wait till children become grown people, for pity's sake, before you expect them to measure each other's worth by what they possess or wear.

"The new schoolmaster, Mieuheer Friedrich comes to-morrow," said Otto. "I am so glad. I am weary of old Master Hoffman, with his crooked problems and hard lessons."

"So was I, truly," said Kline, who, although a good, merry boy, hated his books as he did medicine.

"Ah! thou didst always like play better than work, my Kline," said Max; "and so do I. Meinheer Friedrich will be wise if he keeps thee and me apart during school hours. But, come—see which can get home first—one, two, three!" and away they all scampered, laughing and shouting as only school boys can.

The following day, the boys were standing around the schoolhouse, when the door opened, and Master Friedrich himself appeared, and cried in a cheery, hearty voice:

"Welcome, my children!"

"Welcome, master!" cried they.

And now they entered and took their seats, and were quite still while the good master read a short chapter in the Book of books; and then reverently kneeling, prayed that the dear Savior would guide them in his teachings, and bless them, and send his Holy Spirit to watch over them all.

School began; the thumb-worn books were brought out; the lazy boys began to sigh and frown, and wish impatiently for the recess, and wonder why Latin dictionaries were ever invented; when, as if by magic, they found themselves listening to the pleasant voice of Master Friedrich, and actually understanding their lessons—so clear and simple were his explanations; and the time for recess came, to their great astonishment, long before they had expected.

When the studies were over, the master drew from his desk a box, and whilst the children gathered around he opened it, and drew out charming little white and pink sea shells, pretty pictures, and many other beautiful things, which he gave to the children, with loving words.

But the most lovely thing of all was a little porcelain statuette of an angel. She stood—so fair, so pure—with her small, white hands folded over her breast, and her eyes uplifted, and the children gazed enchanted.

"Oh, the dear angel, the beautiful angel!" cried they all. "Wilt thou not give it to me., Master Friedrich?"

But the good master smiled and said:

"The little angel is too lovely to be given to any boy who is not good and true of heart. We shall presently see who shall deserve her. He who brings me to-morrow the brightest thing on earth shall have the angel." * * * *

"The very best thing on earth is plum cake," cried Kline on the third day, as he walked up to the desk, bearing a large cake richly frosted, with a wreath of sugar roses round the edge—this he placed triumphantly before the master, sure of the prize.

"Nay, thou art wrong this time, Kline," said Max, "I asked my father what was the very best thing on earth, and he gave me this golden guilder—the prize is mine."

"Ah! but my father said that the very best was a good glass of Rhenish wine," cried Otto, and I have brought a bottle of it thirty years old—the prize is surely mine."

So they went on till all had placed their offering before the master.

"And thou, Carl," said he, "what hast thou brought which thou thinkest the best on earth?"

A crimson flush rose to the little boy's forehead, and coming softly forward, he took from his breast a small worn Testament, pressed it to his lips, and then reverently laid it down with the rest—as he said in a low, sweet voice, "My mother, dear master, says that God's precious Testament is far beyond all earthly possessions."

"'Tis thine, my Carl!" cried the master, snatching the boy to his breast. "The white angel is thine! for there is nothing in the wide world half so precious as the blessed words of Christ—and he placed the angel in the hands of the trembling boy.

Kline knit his brows, and gazed with anger and disappointment at the little Carl—and the rest seeing him do this, felt themselves aggrieved, but suddenly the cloud cleared from Kline's face, and rushing forward, he caught Carl in his arms, crying, "forgive me, dear Carl—now I am right glad thou hast won the prize."

Ah! the blessed effect of a bright example! Quickly joining hands, the children danced joyfully around the little Carl, who stood in the midst, the white angel pressed to his heart—his hair falling in curls on his shoulders and his eyes full of holy tears.

The good Master Friedrich also wept for joy, and prayed from the depth of his pure and simple heart, that the Savior would bless this lesson to the children's everlasting good. He had turned away, that none might perceive his tears.

But One in Heaven saw them, Master Friedrich.

What Decision Did.

In the West lived a very proud, wealthy infidel, and irreligious father, who, having one day called his family together, told them if they went to the prayer-meeting and "got religion," as he called it, he would disinherit them, and banish them from the house. The wife and children were included in the threat. The daughter, however, continued to go to the prayer-meetings, and soon found peace in believing in Jesus. When an opportunity offered to make a profession, she meekly arose and spoke of the "great change" in her heart, and of her faith in the Savior.

The news of this was immediately carried to the father of the young lady. Having come home that night, she was met at the door by her father, standing with the Bible in his arms.

"Maria," said he, "I have been told that you have publicly professed, to-night, that you have religion. Is that so?"

"Father," said the girl, "I love you, and I think I love the Savior, too."

Opening his Bible to a blank leaf, and pointing with his finger, he said:

"Maria, whose name is that?"

"It is my name, sir."

"Did I not tell you that I would disinherit you if you got religion?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I must do it. You cannot come into my house." And tearing the leaf out of the Bible, "There," said he, "so do I blot your name from among my children. You can go."

She went to the house of a pious widow in the neighborhood, and heard no more from her father for three weeks. But one morning, seeing her father's carriage driving up to the door, she ran out and said to the driver:

"What is the matter, James?"

"Your father is very sick, and thinks he is going to die; and he is afraid he shall go to hell for his wickedness, and the grievous wrong he has done to you in disinheriting you, and turning you from his house. He wants you to jump into the carriage and come home as quickly as possible."

She found her father sick, sure enough, on going home; but she soon saw that he was only sin-sick.

She talked with him and prayed with him, and endeavored to lead him to Christ. In three days the father, mother, two brothers, and a sister, making the whole family, were all rejoicing in hope.

The Cheerful Giver.

A little girl was tripping home from church one bright Sabbath morning, by the side of her mother. Very thoughtfully she looked awhile, then she said suddenly:

"Mamma, Mr. —— said 'the Lord loveth a cheerful giver,' and that we ought to give Him some of all we have, for He gives it to us first."

"Well," said the lady, slightly coloring.

"Well, mamma, I wish you had put more in the plate this morning. You could afford ever so much."

"My dear," said her mother, "you must leave me to do as I think best. It is proper for little girls to be silent on such subjects; when you are a lady, you may give as much as you please."

"But, dear mamma, I'd rather not have such pretty clothes, and you give the money they cost to Jesus."

They were both silent a little while; then Lizzie, who could not leave the subject so freshly started in her mind, said:

"Mamma, I won't buy any more candy."

"Will you not," said the lady, smiling.

"No; I'll keep all my money for the collections and the Missionary Society. I wonder if Mr. —— saw what you gave this morning," she persisted. "If he didn't, God did, and He knows how rich you are."

Mrs. L. felt half angry, half amused, but she did not check the child, as was her wont; for Lizzie often administered reproof without intending it, and now she felt the truth of these earnest remarks.

"Dear mamma," pursued Lizzie, "won't you give a lot next time?"

"A lot," said the mother, reprovingly.

"As much as you can, I mean. It is for the poor, mamma," she continued, her eyes filling.

Mrs. L. was silent the rest of their walk, and the little girl, seeing one of her companions, forgot the subject for a time.

Mrs. L. never put ten cents into the plate again at a collection. "It is for the poor, mamma," rang in her ears whenever she saw any in distress; and "God knows how rich you are," always sounded clearly as if her child were speaking, whenever she was called upon to give of her substance. So she became a cheerful giver.—Evangelist.

Where is God?

I once asked that question in a Sabbath school. A little boy answered, "In heaven." Children are apt to think that God is a very great way off, and thinking so, they do not come to their heavenly Father, as they would to an earthly parent, to ask for blessings which he has promised to bestow upon such as ask him. They cannot recognize God by any one of their senses, and because they cannot, they imagine him to be at a great distance from them, and forget that he numbers the hairs of their head, and notices all their actions and thoughts. A bishop once said to a little child, "If you will tell me where God is, I will give you an orange." "If you will tell me where he is not, I will give you two," was the child's answer.—Stories for Children.

The Healing Wings.

Behold the darkness flies,
Each hour the morning brings,
The Sun of Righteousness shall rise,
With healing in his wings.

That light that to our souls
From Jesus' face is given,
Shall o'er this world of darkness roll,
And make it bright as heaven.

O may that day soon dawn,
And banish sorrow's night,
We long to greet that radiant morn
Of everlasting light.

Then, wrapt in glad surprise,
We'll strike our sweetest strings
To see that Sun of Glory rise,
With healing in his wings.

Evening Shadows.—No. 14.

BY S. S. BREWER.

"I will show wonders in the heavens."—JOEL.
"Fearful sights and great signs shall there be from heaven."—LUKE.

Never, dear reader, did the lengthened shadows of the sun, projected o'er the face of nature, proclaim with greater certainty the close of day, than does the accumulated and accumulating evidences, as predicted by our divine Lord and Master and the holy prophets, fulfilled and continually fulfilling with astonishing rapidity in our sight and hearing, give certainty of the glorious advent near; and that peculiar class, predicted in the above quotations of holy writ, claims our attention.

The following, coming from the source it does, is to me very interesting. It certainly evinces that the writer has some interest in the words spoken by Joel and Luke.

"THE HEAVENS DECLARE HIS GLORY.—During the last few years the atmosphere has done quite its share for the entertainment of the public. The magnificent comet which a year and a half ago swept through the heavens with its luminous trail, eclipsing the brilliancy of the stars; the auroral lights which, night after night, last winter trembled and quivered in the northern sky, shooting transparent spears of crimson and white from the horizon to the zenith; the aerolites which occasionally fell to the earth; the tornadoes which swept with resistless fury over our western prairies, and the eclipse which but the other day excited the attention of the entire scientific world, have followed each other in rapid succession, prompting some to a more constant study of the heavens for the secret of these phenomena; others to a more reverent feeling of dependence upon Him by whose command all things were made that were made, and terrifying others by the threatening approach of those latter days—those times prophesied by Joel, when wonders should be shown in the sky, and when, according to St. Luke, 'Fearful sights and great signs from heaven' should appear.

Although science has, to a great extent, stripped these atmospheric and other phenomena of their mysterious terror, there is still sufficient mystery about their advent to inspire awe as well as admiration.

Most certainly should every one feel inspired with awe, and with gratitude return thanks to Almighty God for his mercy in imparting timely warning, so that day come not upon us unawares; and also amid the wide spread iniquity that is abounding to such an alarming extent, we may establish our hearts, feeling confident the coming of the Lord draweth near."—New York Evening Post.

Another writer in a New York paper, speaking on the same subject, testifies as follows:—

"METEOROLOGICAL PHENOMENA.—Two days have produced a remarkable series of atmospheric and astronomic scenes. Last evening, at eight o'clock, there was a very brilliant display of the northern lights, extending from the north-west, where the broadest and most luminous exhibition took place, to the south-east. The evening fog, however, which presently turned to rain, dispelled the lights, and all was darkness. On the previous evening, there was the occultation process which we noted yesterday. And before that was the notable thunder storm, and the dark hour. Thunder, lightning, hail, darkness, occultations, auroras, all indicate that these are very remarkable times. The Millerites (were any of them left,) would have it the world is coming to an end. Not so."

O the hardening influence of unbelief! Said the Lord Jesus to his waiting ones, "When ye see all these things, know that it is near." But this writer, after acknowledging them to be "very remarkable times," and paying no regard to the testimony of inspiration, declares the world is not coming to an end.

The Scientific American for Nov. 21st, 1847, speaking of atmospheric phenomena, remarks as follows:—

"Those who are accustomed to making meteorological observations, report the most frequent occurrences within the last three or four months, and especially within a few days, of the most extraordinary irregularities and apparent convulsions of the atmosphere ever recorded or probably witnessed."

E. MERRIAM, a writer for the Scientific American, has recorded a hundred earthquakes, as having occurred in different quarters of the globe, during the years 1845 and 1846. He is reported to have said that at one time in 1847 there was, within a few degrees, a perfect equilibrium in the atmosphere, the world over, which, had it continued a short space longer, would have resulted in a universal convulsion of the whole earth."

The late Henry Jones, in his work called "CELESTIAL PHENOMENA," records the following very alarming occurrence:—

"A clergyman of Massachusetts gave me the following account of a phenomena, as he and others witnessed it, in one of the towns of Cape Cod, in that State. He was sitting with another minister in the pulpit, who had just commenced a discourse on the subject of the final judgment, to a crowded audience of a protracted meeting; when suddenly, through the windows, the whole house was filled with the most vivid and fiery light, SO ALARMING IN ITS APPEARANCE that several of the audience shrieked aloud. All was disorder and commotion; many rushed for the doors, and all prospect of further worship for the time seemed to be lost, till one from without, perceiving the consternation within, forced his way through the astonished crowd up to the desk, with an account of the aurora phenomenon as just witnessed by those out of doors. Then this clergyman, as he said, called attention, and informed the audience that 'they had more cause for admiration than alarm, and that the appearance which they had just witnessed was but a beautiful and unusually splendid exhibition of the Aurora Borealis, which the Lord had been giving them.' Then the audience resumed their seats, and the meeting went on."

Thus, dear reader, has our heavenly Father been for many years past giving us the harbingers of his coming to judge the world in righteousness, and "destroy them" that corrupt the earth. That day is now very near. There is a concentrating of all the evidences into one grand focal point. It should be conversed on under every proper circumstance. Yes, it must be enforced with renewed zeal. Watchman, proclaim it fearlessly, solemnly, and with the love of God for perishing sinners in thy heart. Formalist, put off your corsets of over-strained particularities, and put on the Lord Jesus Christ. Backslider, awake! sinners are stumbling over you, and their blood will soon be found in your garments. Sinner, dear precious soul, come to Jesus. Look! see the dark clouds of portentous omen gathering over the nations of the earth, which will soon break in wrath upon all them that know not God, and "obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ."

"Lift your heads, ye friends of Jesus,
Partners in his patience here;
Christ to all believers precious,
Lord of Lords will soon appear.
Mark the tokens! mark the tokens
Of his heavenly kingdom near."

Church Ordinances.

"Now I praise you, brethren, that ye remember me in all things, and keep the ordinances, as I delivered them to you."—1 COR. 11: 2.

The visible organization of "the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth," in a benighted and fallen world, was committed by the ascending Savior to his inspired apostles. "Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them into (eis) the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen." Matt. 28: 18–20. For the establishing of his church, which is "the light of the world" and "the salt of the earth," he gave commandments unto the apostles whom he had chosen." Acts 1: 2.

They faithfully fulfilled their high commission, and delivered to the churches what they had "received of the Lord." 1 Cor. 11: 23. They taught the same things "in every church." 1 Cor. 4: 17.

Such, my christian brethren, was their divine authority, and such the importance of our conformity to their inspired teachings, that they said, "We are of God. He that knoweth God, heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error." 1 John 4: 6. In holy obedience, the first christians "gladly received" their inspired word, and "were immersed," and "continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread and in prayers." Acts 2: 41, 42.

But, beloved, from the beginning even to the present day, there have been "false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ," (2 Cor. 11: 13,) through whose pride and covetousness the true disciples of the Lord Jesus have been "corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." 2 Cor. 11: 3. "Lords over God's heritage" have grossly and selfishly perverted the simplicity of christian ordinances, by making their own presence and formalities absolutely essential to their observance, without an iota of warrant of either precept or example, from the only acknowledged rule of christian faith and practice.

For what purpose were officers ordained in the christian churches? Was it because the churches had no right to enjoy divine ordinances which they could enjoy in existing circumstances, until the appointment of Elders or Bishops? This is no more in accordance with either reason or scripture, than that the inhabitants of a city have no right to their property until a municipal government is formed for its better security.

The dogma, "No bishop, no church," finds its clear refutation in the scriptural fact that churches existed some time before elders or bishops were ordained in them. Acts 14: 23. The ascended Savior, who has purchased his church with his own blood, and ever bears them on his heart, "gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ," &c. Eph. 4: 11, 12. He promised his gracious presence to "two or three" assembled in his name to observe his ordinances, which he has given to his disciples. "Two or three" thus meeting are a christian church, an ecclesia or congregation.

How plain, dear brethren, is the teaching of the heavenly record, when divested of the perversions of fallible men! Infinite love proclaims to a world in rebellion against the righteous government of God, that he has given his own Son, "that whosoever believeth on him, should not perish, but have everlasting life." John 3: 16. The penalty of the violated law is death, which is cessation of life or conscious being. Rom. 6: 23. The first duty of the sinner is "repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ." Acts 20: 21. The second is immersion in water. When the hearers of the gospel cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do? then Peter said unto them, Repent and be baptized (immersed) every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ," &c. Acts 2: 38. "Then they that gladly received his word were immersed," ver. 41. That this was an immersion in water, is evident from the recorded facts concerning it. "John was baptizing in Enon, near to Salim, because there was much water there." John 3: 23. See also Acts 8: 38, 10: 47, Matt. 3: 16. "When they believed Philip, preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized both men and women." Acts 8: 12. Not children. Not a single precept; not a solitary example, does the only rule of christian practice present to sustain either the sprinkling or immersion of unconscious babes, as an ordinance of our divine religion. It is a tradition of men which makes void the commandment of the Lord. A departure from the simplicity of the Gospel has extended not only to the mode and subjects of this sacred institution, but also to its administration. Our Lord has connected the duty of baptizing with the duty of preaching the word. Matt. 28: 19. I remember an aged Baptist minister, many years ago, charging the churches with separating what Christ had united, in licensing men to preach and not allowing them to baptize. Whoever, like Philip, preaches Jesus to dying men, may, like him, (who was not an elder or bishop of a church) baptize such as believe with all the heart that Jesus is the Son of God. Acts 8: 35–37.

The next item of holy duty demanding our regard is the recorded fact of baptized believers, rejoicing in redeeming love, and the hope of life eternal, meeting together on the first day of the week to commemorate that love, and to edify one another in the observance of the ordinances of divine worship. They obeyed the imperative command, "Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another; and so much the more, as ye see the day approaching." Heb. 10: 25. Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread," &c. Mark here, brethren, two things. First, they "came together to break bread," not on the first day of the month, or quarter year, but on the first day of the week. That the first churches practiced weekly communion is an historical fact. Secondly. Although they observed the other ordinances of prayer, singing and teaching, this ordinance is the only one mentioned as the special object of their coming together. Well may it be so. It is commemorative of the great sacrifice for the sins of a lost world! In it, we "behold the Lamb of God" which taketh away the sins of the world." "Herein is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." 1 John 4: 10. The commandment of their blessed Master, "Do this in remembrance of me," was joyfully obeyed as often as they assembled on the first day of the week and taught the "apostles' doctrine," and attended to the fellowship, or contribution, (2 Cor. 8: 4, 1 Cor. 16: 2,) and prayers. "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in BREAKING OF BREAD, and in prayers." Acts 2: 42. It is true, indeed, that our Lord said, "As oft as ye eat this bread," &c.; but we are clearly instructed how often he would have us do it, by the approved examples of the churches, taught by the apostles, who delivered to them what they received of the Lord Jesus. See 1 Cor. 11: 23, Matt. 28: 20, Acts 1: 2, 1 Cor. 14: 37.

This view of this important duty and precious privilege is confirmed by the instruction of the apostle to the church of Corinth, 1 Cor. 11th chap. In reproving them for their disorderly manner of observing the institution, he remarks, "When ye come together therefore into one place, this is not to eat the Lord's supper; for in eating every one taketh before his own supper," &c. It is here clearly implied, that the chief object of assembling, as at Troas, (Acts 20: 7) was "to eat the Lord's supper." His direction, "When ye come together to eat, tarry one for another," plainly shows that it had the precedence of other ordinances and was observed at the commencement of the services. Acts 20: 11 is no objection, for that refers to the individual act of the apostle, for his refreshment before his departure, and not to the ordinance, which was observed before his preaching. See Acts 27: 35.

In view of the divine testimony now adduced, beloved, I submit that monthly or quarter yearly observances of the ordinance, and making the presence of either Elder or deacon essential to its observance, are corruptions from the simplicity of Jesus Christ. Examine for yourselves, with a single eye to the holy truth, and see if you can find any more authority to forbid two or three disciples to come together on the first day of the week to break bread, than to forbid them to come together to pray and sing and exhort one another. The true believer in the great sacrifice needs no hands or prayers of pretended successors to the apostles to render the bread which he breaks, and the cup for which he gives thanks, the communion of the body and blood of his Savior to his ransomed and joyful soul. Alas! my brethren, how has our divine Master been dishonored; and what loss of sacred privilege we have sustained, by submission to authority, assumed by fallible men to maintain their proud dignity "as lords over God's heritage." That many, through error of judgment, have adopted usurpations with better motives, we freely admit. How manifest is the impropriety of neglecting so large a portion of the times of meeting for christian worship "on the first day of the week," the only ordinance which is declared in the word of God to be the chief object of our assembling together!

We have no scriptural authority for applying the term "ordinances" in the passage under consideration exclusively to baptism and the Lord's supper. The import of the term is appointments, and refers to the acts to be observed by christians in their associated capacity.

From Acts 2: 42, 1 Tim. 2: 1, 1 Cor. 14: 15, &c., we learn that prayers for all men is one of those ordinances;—to "pray with the spirit and with the understanding also." The leading of the prayers of the church by the Elders or Deacons exclusively, is another corruption. The blessed unction of the Holy Spirit, by which the renewed soul pours out its desires and thanksgivings to the Father of mercies, is not confined to the officers of the christian church.

United praise, singing with the spirit and the understanding, "making melody in (our) hearts unto the Lord," is another of the holy ordinances of the house of God, built up of "lively stones," a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." 1 Pet. 2: 5, Col. 3: 16, 1 Cor. 14: 15, Eph. 5: 19. Alas! my brethren, how has this delightful act of christian worship, approximating nearest to the celestial, been profaned and corrupted, by the substitution of "choirs" of ungodly persons, for that spiritual worship which the Holy One, who will not be mocked, requires! "Unto the wicked, God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldst take my covenant into thy mouth?" &c. Psa. 50: 16. Yet into such mouths has the church, professing the holiness which becometh God's house forever, put the most solemn professions of holy exercises, which his word assures us is "an abomination" and lying unto him. Prov. 21: 27, Ps. 78: 36. "If we would sing the songs of angels, we must have the sentiments of angels. "Neither is God to be worshiped by proxy.

For the Crisis.

Thoughts of the Departed.

They are passing down to the valley dark,
One by one,
As time o'ertarns life's fragile bark,
One by one.
They go down to the realms where silence reigns,
They are firmly bound by death's icy chains,
The rich and poor in one bed lie,
Unequalled till they came to die.

Death spares not friends, and takes our foes,
One by one,
The proud, the meek, their eyelids close,
One by one.
The mother and child are cold in death,
The husband and wife yield up their breath,
The hoary sire and the nursling one
Must go from the world when their days are done.

The homes we loved have strange appeared,
One by one,
And fallen the vines that in youth we reared,
One by one.
Our parents have left the old arm-chair,—
Sad home, no brother or sister there,
The holy altar has vanished away,
Not a voice is left in that house to pray.

The blinds have closed round each weary form,
One by one,
And bid them away from this world's rude storm,
One by one.
They are blest, for they died in the Lord, we trust,
And angels are guiding their life-doomed dust.
O earth! in thy bosom their Lord has lain,
But he rose that they might live again.

They passed away to the dreary land,
One by one,
They gave to us the parting hand,
One by one.
But they'll all come back at the end of time,
TOGETHER they'll come in a band sublime,
The fearful clouds shall pass away,
They'll live and sing in endless day,
Amen! amen my soul doth say. MARIA.

The End at Hand.

The following interesting remarks are from a little four paged tract, signed,—"A WATCHMAN." We are satisfied that he is looking at things in their true light. Let the reader judge for himself."—G

THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES.
WORDS OF WARNING.

"So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." See Matt. 24: 3, 33.

Says the New York Independent, "We are as much called upon to study the signs of the times, to watch for the coming of the Son of Man, and to be ready for every sign of his appearing." Says the New York Observer, "There are those who see in the dark portentous signs that appear in our own and other lands, the most convincing proofs that the day of the Lord is at hand. The great tribulation has come." See Matt. 24: 15, Dan. 12: 1, Mark 13: 19.

The "tribulation" spoken of by Christ, precedes other scenes immediately in concert with his second coming,—Matt. 24: 29, 30. Not in the far distant, uncertain future, Mark 13: 29, Luke 21: 31. Not when sin will be done away with, James 5: 1–9. Not when the world will be prepared, or even looking for him, Matt. 25: 42, 44. But as the days of Noah were, (or as in the days of Lot,) so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. Matt. 24: 36–39; Luke 17: 28, 30.

Many of the most learned Bible students agree that we have reached a period in the Apocalypse synchronizing with that event. Rev. 9: 13, 14–21; 10: 1–11; 11: 1–14. The terminations of the great prophetical periods, by universal consent, and near Sabbatical dawn of the seventh thousand year of the world—the gospel proclaimed to all nations, Matt. 24: 14. The times of the Gentiles being fulfilled, Rom. 11: 25, 26; and embraced in the prophetic period when the stone, cut out of the mountain without hands, shall smite the image, demolishing all earthly rule—when Christ's kingdom will fill the whole earth. Dan. 2: 31–45; Luke 20: 18. The present condition of the world, as predicted it would be in the last days. Matt. 24: 38, 39; Matt. 13: 38–43. Scoffers, saying, where is the promise of his coming. 2 Pet. 3: 3, 4, 7, 10, 11, 12,

A sleeping, slumbering, worldly-minded church, putting far off that day. Matt. Matt. 24: 46, 48–51; 25: 1–30. A turning away from the truth unto fables. 2 Tim. 4: 3, 4. Sin and wickedness, as in the days of Noah and Lot, every where abounding, 1 Thess. 2: 3–12. Earthquakes, famines, pestilences, in divers places, Mark 13: 8. Commotions, Luke 21: 19. The Papacy tottering, Rev. 18: 15–24. Modern Spiritualism, 1 Tim. 4: 1; 2 Cor. 11: 13, 14; 2 Pet. 2: 1, 2; 2 Thess. 2: 1–12; or spirits of devils working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of the great day of God Almighty. Rev. 16: 12–15; 3: 10; 12: 12; Isa. 24: 5, 6; 26: 20, 21; 34: 1–4, 8; Dan. 12: 1, Zeph. 3: 8, Jer. 25: 31–33, Zeph. 1: 2, 14–15; Mal. 4: 1–3; Rev. 18: 4, 5. Perilous times, 2 Tim. 3: 1–5. Distress of nations, with perplexity, Luke 21: 25, 26. Men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth as a snare, Luke 21: 26, 35; now fulfilling, and being fulfilled, all in accordance with the unfailing Word of Inspiration, emphatically proclaim, "Behold HE COMETH WITH CLOUDS, and every eye shall see him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him." Rev. 1: 7; 6: 14–47; 14: 7: 14–20; 2 Thess. 1: 7, 8; 2 Pet. 3: 10–12; Jude 14, 15; John 5: 27–29; Ps. 92: 7; Matt. 13: 41, 42; Mark 8: 38; Rom. 2: 5, 9, 10, 11.

But gathered from every nation, kindred, tongue and people, of those "who love his appearing," 2 Tim. 4: 8. Quickened to immortality with his resurrected saints and covenanted people, 1 Cor. 15: 51–53, will with joys unspeakable welcome the long looked for dawn of millennial glory, and Zion's coming King, "In whose presence is fulness of joy, and at whose right hand there are pleasures forevermore." Rev. 11: 15; Dan. 7: 27; Ps. 37: 11; Isa. 25: 8; Zec. 14: 20; Isa. 35: 10; 52: 9; 51: 11; Rev. 19: 5–9. But to the foolish virgins, to those who are at ease in Zion, will the door be forever shut, and the woe pronounced. "Many shall say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity." Matt. 7: 22, 23. The time is fulfilling, the kingdom of God is at hand, (therefore) repent ye, believe and obey the gospel, Mark 1: 15; Acts 2: 38. "For in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh."

Says the Christian Chronicle, "There is, perhaps, no important prediction, the accomplishment of which could delay the Savior's Advent for a single hour."

The Alliance and Visiter truly remarks, "The events of centuries have been crowded into a year. The hand of God should be recognized in these remarkable events."

The Living Age has said, "Old things are about to pass away, and we know not what shall be the new. All faces gather blackness, and men's hearts fail them for fear of what is coming on the earth."

The Christian Luminary says, "Signs are seen in the heavens and on earth, which plainly teach us the fact that the Coming of the Son of Man draweth nigh." Another Journal has stated,—"The world is now just about 6,000 years old,—It is well to be ready for whatever event may occur."

The Christian Review has recorded as follows: "A silent, rapid, irresistible preparation has been making—what will it be? The battle of Armageddon? The Millenium?—preceded by the Coming of the Son of Man in the clouds of heaven? Nothing in the prophecies withholds his coming, that I have seen—if I have read Peter, and Daniel, and John aright."

Says Charles Beecher, referring the present, vast, "pneumatic or spiritual movement to the category of Rev. 11: 14," "they incur the almost certain stigma of false Christs which should precede his coming."

Prof. Geo. Bush has said, "If we take the ground of good reason, we must believe that the present age is one expressly foretold in prophecy, and that it is just opening upon the crowning consummation of all prophetic declarations."

Dr. Lyman Beecher everywhere affirms, "that the sixth vial is now being poured out, and near its conclusion,—that the millenial day is near, even at the doors,"—that the Lord is soon to come."

"Dr. Edward Beecher writes, "The point of prophetic chronology at which the world has now arrived, is the interval between the sounding of the sixth and seventh trumpets.

Archdeacon Brown, of England, has said, "that he was strongly impressed with the conviction that our lot had fallen under the solemn period emphatically designated by Daniel as 'The time of the end.'"

President Hitchcock, of Amherst, has stated, "In a very short time, far shorter than we imagine, all the scenes of futurity will be to us a thrilling reality!"

Daniel Eddy, of Lowell, has also said, "Time has grown old. Six thousand years encircle its weary brow; and with inconceivable rapidity it rushes on to its eternal sepulchre. The great events connected with the winding up of all things, are near—are but a step before us,"—even "when the Son of man shall come in his glory; and every eye shall see him."

O, all ye lukewarm Laodicean churches, followers of the world and its fashions! How is it that ye do not discern the 'signs of the times,' nor take heed to the sure word of prophecy? For truly, you all shall see him. 2 Pet. 1: 19. Mark 13: 23. Luke 21: 35. Rev. 3: 10, 11, 16, 17, 21.

Vain worldling, heedless youth, profane swearer, sensual, groveling, pleasure seekers, you shall also see him. Proud, haughty man of ambition, or of wealth, covetous lovers of this world, heaping up treasures for the last days,—you too 'shall see him.'

Vain and giddy triflers, followers of the fashions and frivolities of the day,—you "shall also see him." Ye who turn aside from Christ, from truth and duty, from mercy and humanity's calls,—you also "shall see him." Careless, worldly-minded professor, having a form of godliness, turning your back on Christ, and absorbed in earth's pursuits, take heed! for you also "shall see him," for all betoken, (as in the days of Noah and Lot,) in striking fulfillment of prophecy, the sad condition of a ruined world, and its hastening doom!

Yes, reader, you too shall see him. The living and the righteous dead shall see him. The wise and foolish virgins shall see him. Those who put far away the evil day shall see him. Scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites shall see him. All perverters of God's word shall see him, and all kindreds of the earth "shall wail because of him," "for sudden destruction cometh upon them, and they shall not escape." REPENT. "BEHOLD I COME QUICKLY." 2 Pet. 3: 7; 2 Thess. 1: 7–9; Ps. 73: 19; Matt. 13: 43; Rev. 1: 7, 8, 18; 2: 16; 3: 10, 11.

The Sea of Glass.

"O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day."

Such are the words that fell from the lips of the sweet singer of Israel; and such is the language of every pilgrim and stranger, whose heart is not overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life, while pressing his way through manifold temptations, with the determination of having an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom.

And now I have a few ideas to give about the "sea of glass." Some have an idea that the "sea of glass" is God's word, and it is that which the harpers stand upon, harping with their harps. Says John, "I saw as it were a sea of glass." Mark the language—"as it were"; that is, saw, or had a panoramic view of something that looked like, or resembled, "a sea of glass." Now before I give you my views what the "sea of glass" is, I shall give you my reasons for disbelieving that it is the word of God.

In the first place, you will see by reading the verse through, (Rev. 15: 2,) that it is a class of beings who have gotten victory over the beast, and his image, his mark and the number of his name. When has this song ever been sung? Did the saints sing it while passing through the scene of bloody persecution? Nay. Would it not be folly for the Unionists to shout victory over the Rebels, while at the same time they were waging war against them? Most assuredly. Did our forefathers celebrate their independence until after the last battle was fought? Nay. Well, then, do you not see the absurdity of calling God's word the sea of glass? O children, when this blessed truth has its fulfillment, you and I, if faithful, will cease warring against the spirit. Instead of shouting victory now, our cry is, help Lord, for the godly man ceaseth, and the faithful fail from the children of men. Having shown you why I disbelieve the word to be the "sea of glass," I shall proceed with my views upon it. I believe this will have a literal fulfillment. Now we will see if we can find anything in the future, that will resemble "a sea of glass."

Come with me in your imagination, and I will talk of things that "be not as though they were." Do you see yonder golden city, with its massive pearly gates and its jasper walls, that is illuminated by our Father and his dear Son? Well, let us draw near. Hark! what is that which floats so harmoniously upon the balmy air? It sounds like "harpers harping with their harps." It is the song of victory. We enter the city. O the glory! We see a beautiful river gliding sweetly along, clear as crystal, whose banks are lined with trees. We see groups of little ones sporting beneath their rich laden boughs. Look yonder. O there is our "sea of glass." Now we see the harpers standing thereon. We draw near, and behold it is the street of gold, so clear that it looked like glass; as it were transparent glass. There, brethren and sisters, now you've got my views of the "sea of glass." The best of all is, when we get there, we shall not be grieved with the sight that we see here. We shall not see some there with their fine, large mansions, ornamented inside and out, and others loaded with poverty. No covetousness, or idolatry, can enter there. Dear children, let us be conquerors through grace. We've got a short battle to fight with the enemy.

"Then gird on thine armor, O Christian, with care,
The time of great peril prevails every where;
Be watchful, be prayerful, forgiving and kind,
The enemy watches each unguarded mind."

The World's Crisis

AND

SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, Nov. 27, 1861.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

Hereafter all letters, communications, remittances and orders for the World's Crisis are to be directed to ELDER MILES GRANT, Boston, Mass.

Coming Events.

It is often said, "Coming events cast their shadows before." If we are to judge of the magnitude of the approaching event by the extent and effect of the shadow, we should be fully persuaded that some great and strange phenomenon is now at hand, even if we entirely neglected to "take heed" to the 'sure word of prophecy;" but when we turn to the prophetic panorama, we are startled at the sight, when we see that all the great chains of events, as delineated by the prophets, that run to the close of the christian dispensation, are now converging to a grand focal point, but a short distance in the future. This accounts for the fact that deep, dark shadows are continually lengthening and spreading their gloom around, warning the inhabitants of our planet that their day of probation is nearly expired; and soon the gospel sun will set upon those who have rejected the offer of salvation from the Prince of peace. He has waited long, and borne with our wicked race till mockery, robbery, licentiousness, war, oppression, voluptuousness, pride, covetousness, formality and infidelity, are sweeping like a mighty deluge over the world, and but few dare to face the overwhelming current.

Christian, stand firmly for the right. It is no time to falter now. Every step is watched by the enemy, and his snares are sure to entrap them at the first departure from the narrow way. Obey the Captain of our salvation, and all will be well. Keep "unspotted from the world." There is no victory promised only to "the pure in heart."

Great efforts will be made to keep you quiet and conservative in this time of peril, for the purpose of getting you to sleep in this hour of greatest danger. Every foe is awake, and shall we be slumbering at the point where every thing is liable to be lost, if we do not watch? A little carelessness now, and eternal life is lost! Reader, arouse! The last sands of time are falling, and soon the trumpet will sound to call the dead from their sleep in the dust. Soon the King of kings will appear in all his glory to gather the faithful, and give them "the kingdom under the whole heaven." Friends long separated by death will soon greet each other in their happy, paradise home, where sorrow will be forever unknown. My dear brother, shall we meet them there to celebrate the marriage supper of the Lamb? We must be in that company. It is our duty to be there. Let us say, by the grace of God, we will be there. If you say, amen, then remember to "watch and pray," lest you be ensnared by the wiles of Satan.—o.

The Prophetic Periods.

It is a matter of much importance, to those who are interested in the second coming of Christ, to ascertain the commencement and termination of the prophetic periods as given by Daniel and John. Much has been written, different opinions have been advanced by the learned and the good, and still the point is a matter unsettled in many honest minds. We are expecting more light on this interesting and important part of prophecy; and it is our conviction that a clear understanding of the prophetical periods will come in to complete the evidences of Christ's coming. At least, it seems reasonable to suppose that we should first have signs to indicate that the great event was drawing near, in order to awaken interest in the subject and cause the children of the Lord to arise and trim their lamps, as indicated in the parable of the ten virgins, and afterwards, when these evidences had produced their designed effect, as in the days of Noah and Lot, receive more definite evidence.

It is evident that after the date of an event is fixed and known, we need no signs to show its near approach. All that is necessary in such a case is to watch the time. We most firmly believe that most of the signs that are to precede the coming of Christ are now in the past. A few items only remain to be accomplished, hence, we have come to the point where we may expect a clearer light on the prophetical periods. We know not from whence it will come, but we are expecting it from some source; and we may reasonably expect that the true light will be clear and unmistakable, so that all the faithful children of the Lord will be satisfied; while the world will scoff on, as in the days of Noah, till the great day of the Lord burst upon their astonished vision. Those who have rejected the evidences of Christ's coming, as indicated by the signs, seen in the heavens and on the earth, it is feared will also refuse what additional light may yet be given by the prophetical periods.

If men loved the event they would be eager to get all the evidence possible to show it near; or if they feared it, they would also be anxious to know if it was soon coming. At the present day, but few either love or fear the coming of the day of the Lord. A few despised ones are lifting up their heads, knowing that their redemption draweth nigh; but the great mass of professors of religion seem as indifferent about the event as the careless world around; and what is worse, it seems almost impossible to awaken them from their heedless slumbers. They rejected the first light that came by the signs in the heavens, and having done this, they continue to close their eyes and ears to all the additional light that has been added from year to year, so that it is greatly to be feared they will sleep on now till awakened to a sense of their awful situation by "the sign of the Son of man in heaven," which will cause "all the tribes of the earth" to "mourn." While they are dreaming of good days to come, neglecting the prayer and conference meetings, feasting in pleasure scenes at picnics, fairs, festivals, excursions, concerts, celebrations, surprise parties, sociables, and other amusements, the great bell of time strikes the hour to close up the present dispensation, and establish the everlasting kingdom of God. Dear reader, be ready for the day. Keep thy heart pure, trusting in the Lord. "The pure in heart . . . shall see God."—o

Things in Italy.

The car of revolution is still in motion in Italy, and the temporal power of the Pope is fast passing away; or, as expressed by the prophet Daniel, when speaking of this power as seen in the last part of its history,—They shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end." The most careful observers see little or no prospect, that the temporal power of the Pope will ever be restored. Even the Catholics themselves speak of the present as "the last Pope." No bright spot appears for the future of Papacy. A dark cloud hangs over the city upon "the seven hills." Her cup is full, and her day of doom is evidently at hand. The blood of martyrs cries for vengeance, and the trump which will awaken them from the dead may be expected to sound soon. It is strange that the mass of professors are so indifferent to the filling up of the great prophetic chart; and yet if it were not so, the last pencillings of the prophet would not be accurate.

A noted pamphlet has recently been published in Rome, by Passaglia, a man who has been noted for his learning, as well as his devotion to the Roman church. He has been considered one of the best supporters of Pius IX.; but in the pamphlet, he takes the position that the temporal power of the Pope is not sanctioned by Scripture nor early tradition. The boldness with which Passaglia speaks at this time against the power usurped by the popes of Rome, is thought to be good evidence that he is sustained by a strong party in the church. His pamphlet has been condemned, and he has been obliged to flee for safety to the protection of Victor Emanuel. These movements show that he is in sympathy with those who are trying to liberate Italy, and that the Pope's foes are those of his own household, who, like Passaglia, may be expected to assist in the Italian revolution.

It is is said he is now engaged in editing a paper at Florence, advocating the separation of Church and State. All these things are ominous of the end. All the lines of prophecy appear to be converging to a point not far from the present time. o.

Explanation of Acts 13: 48.

Bro. D. R. wishes an explanation of the latter clause of Acts 10: 48, which reads, "And as many as were ordained to eternal life, believed."

In the new translation by the Amer. Bible Union it is rendered, "And as many as were determined for everlasting life believed." In a note it is said, "As many, then, as were resolved, or determined for eternal life, were attentive hearers of the word; and, therefore, believed." The learned Kuinoel remarks on this passage, in substance, as follows: "The true cause why the Gentiles were by God ordained to eternal life was their faith; as the rejection of his Divine doctrine was the cause, on account of which the Jews rendered themselves unworthy of this felicity."

Dr. Clark remarks on this passage:—"Whatever tetagmenoi may mean, which is the word we translate ordained," it "includes no idea of pre-ordination, or predestination of any kind. . . . The verb tatto or tasso, signifies to place, set, order, appoint, dispose; hence it has been considered here as implying the disposition or readiness of mind of several persons in the congregation, such as the religious proselytes mentioned ver. 43, who possessed the reverse of the disposition of those Jews, who spake against those things, contradicting and blaspheming, ver. 45. Though the word in this place has been variously translated; yet of all the meanings ever put on it, none agree worse with its nature and known signification, than that which represents it as intending those who were predestinated to eternal life; this is no meaning of the term, and should never be applied to it."

We give below several translations of this passage which are in harmony with the foregoing remarks of Dr. Clark:—

"And as many as were disposed for aionian life, believed," Emphatic Diaglott. "And as many believed as were disposed for aeonian life," Scarlett. "And as many as were disposed to everlasting life believed," Improved Version. "And as many as were disposed to eternal life, believed," Mace. "And as many as were disposed for eternal life, believed," New Covenant. "And as many as were fitly disposed for everlasting life, believed," Thompson. "And as many as were determined for everlasting life, believed," Boothroyd. "And as many as were so disposed, believed unto eternal life," Wakefield.

When speaking of this passage, it is remarked in Bowyer's "Conjectures," p. 376, that the idea of the original is better expressed in the following: "And as many of them as were collected together, believed in everlasting life;" or, "And so many of them as had appointed a day, professed their belief in eternal life."

In his notes on this passage, Wesley says, "He [Paul] is not speaking of what was done from eternity, but of what was then done through the preaching of the gospel. He is describing that ordination, and that only, which was at the very time of hearing it. . . . The sum is, all those and those only, who were now ordained, now believed."—o.

Lay Preachers.

Whatever may be the variety of views with reference to a settled ministry or the orders of ministry, it is certain that both existed in the apostolic church where congregations were brought into complete order. That they were exactly like the Episcopal, Presbyterian, or any other church of these times, we do not believe. But that James was the settled minister of Jerusalem, and Paul at one place two years or more—doing pastoral as well as apostolic and evangelistic work, &c.,—none familiar with the New Testament can doubt. Indeed the very nature of the pastoral work requires a settled ministry. Pastors are under shepherds, and to perform their duties must have a flock and a fold. It is also true that in every church there was ordained a plurality of ministers, or elders. (Acts 14: 23.) And thus it is probable that all the available help of the church was brought into action as soon as fully developed.

But alas! primitive times are past; and these are the times, when the whole work of divine service is committed to a hired ministry, who, aided by a quartette, praise and worship God, and do all the work for a church. But with all the influence in favor of a popular christianity, this arrangement never did and never can suffice for a spiritually minded people. They cannot worship God by proxy; and when the love of God wells up in their hearts, and all the realities of divine things come before them, they cannot refrain from opening their mouth and speaking for Jesus. It was for want of such privileges that multitudes during the history of the church have felt justified in separating themselves from the older establishments.

It is with such thoughts in mind, we exhort all who are possessed of the requisite ability, and have it in their hearts, to open their mouths for Jesus, and do whatever they becomingly can, in every place, to proclaim the glad tidings of the kingdom of God. In such an arrangement there is nothing that need conflict with good order, or the duties of the pastorate: but on the contrary, properly cherished and guided, is one of the most wholesome and effective agencies of the church. Witness for example the whole history of early Methodism; that remarkable religious move of '57, chiefly if not wholly owing to the labors of laymen.

Nor is this a new or modern contrivance. Philip preached, and with mighty effect too, at Samaria, when we have no account of his ordination. Origen, though in the middle of the third century, (when priestly presumption became considerably developed,) was allowed to preach, by the Bishops of Jerusalem and Cesarea; but being complained of by another bishop, these Bishops wrote as follows:—"You write, that you never before heard that laymen should preach in presence of bishops; in this you have widely and strangely wandered from the truth: when there are found such as are able to profit the brethren, the bishops exhort them to preach." Hilary, in his comment on Ephesians, says, "It was granted to all at first, the laity as well as the clergy, both to preach the gospel and to baptize."

When we contemplate the vast amount of power there is in the church,—laid away in napkins, or as if buried in the ground,—and then contemplate the crying wants of the church, our language is, "Would God that all the Lords people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his Spirit upon them"! (Num. 11. 27.)

"Oh for such love, let rocks and hills
Their lasting silence break!
And all harmonious human tongue,
Their Savior's praises speak." M.

"The first shall be last, and the last first."—A few hours after receiving the notice of the Rev. Mr. Baxter's labors—which we elsewhere publish—we had our attention called to a somewhat lengthy article from the pen of the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D. D., setting forth his faith in the speedy advent of the Lord. Of the prophetic periods Dr. Tyng says,—"they have a very remarkable common termination." He shortly adds,—"All these Scriptural periods have a common termination about the year 1868 of the Christian era."

Here are two Episcopal clergymen, the one author of several publications (on this subject,) that have been published by the thousands, and the other editor of a popular and thoroughly evangelical journal, both proclaiming in unmistakable terms, that the advent of Christ is right upon us. Neither are they alone in their faith or work. But the thought occurs, where are those who a few years ago were strong in the faith of Christ's speedy advent? Where are those who lead in the van? Alas! alas! has God left us to content ourselves with the discussion of subjects of minor importance, or to spiritual slothfulness; or, to what is worse, vain jangling? Can it be that we who a few years since were most joyful in expectation of speedy redemption, shall at last be found asleep? "Ye brethren are not in darkness." But let us take heed, lest in our case the text be verified, "The first shall be last, and the last first!" Surely, we have reason to "watch and pray, and pray and watch" every hour until we witness the coming of the Son of man. Signs are increasing within and without. May God make us ready, all ready for the grand event.—M.

Lord's day, Nov. 17th, we spent with the church of New Bedford. We have here one of our most substantial and healthful churches—composed of good men. Found them as formerly with a large and interesting congregation, and apparently full of good cheer.

Elder S. S. Brewer meanwhile preached to a large and attentive congregation at Chapman (large) Hall, pouring out the convincing matters-of-fact illustrative of the past and present fulfillment of prophecy,—not as they are sometimes presented, in a cold, or turgid, or purely controversial manner; but attended with the warming, comforting influences of a devoted mind. We are glad to report of this veteran of the cause, that his health is improved to what it was when we last met him, and as usual his heart seems full of the love of God.—M.

Acknowledgment.—We enjoyed Thanksgiving in company with Eld. Brewer and our families in Fairmount, per invitation of Bro. E. J. Coleman and friends in Fairmount. We had a repast every way becoming the puritanical idea of Thanksgiving, though on an Englishman's table. And while thankful to God, we could not forget those who lacked the comforts we enjoyed, and at the same time refrained not from the catholic cry, "Come, Lord Jesus"; come and bring the times of refreshing for all the faithful; when oppression, bloodshed and poverty will not come into mind. But the best of our feast was the last part, when we assembled in the evening with the company of the faithful, to sing the songs of Zion, to bow at the mercy-seat, and speak words of good cheer. We felt, "the best of all, God is with us." May God reward our friends for their christian kindness.—M.

Prophetical Lectures.

Mr. M. Baxter, an English preacher, who has been lecturing in Canada, where considerable interest has been awakened through him in the doctrine of the speedy coming of Christ, and recently in St. Paul's (Episcopal) church in this city, has also been holding meetings in St. Luke's (Episcopal) church, and the Advent Hall in Portland, Me. While holding the same general views as interpreters of the school of Dr. Cumming, as to 1868–9 being the end of this dispensation, he also advances views in detail of the following nature:— G.

"Louis Napoleon is taken according to the expositions of Faber, Frere, Jackson, Gauntlett, etc., to be undoubtedly the eighth head of the beast, or infidel antichrist; and in such character is expected to make a seven years covenant with the Jews very speedily, in fulfillment of Daniel's seventieth week, Dan. 9: 27.

About nine months and twenty-five days after the date of this covenant, it appears that the Jews will restore the daily sacrifice at Jesusalem, commencing afresh the observance of the Mosaic rites. The complete overthrow of the Turkish empire is also foreshown to take place at that period; and then at the distance of about two years, one month and ten days, or else of about two years, ten months and twenty days after the date of the above mentioned covenant, it seems that the personal coming of Christ himself will take place, in order to translate the 144,000 wise virgins and raise the dead saints. But this is only the first stage of Christ's advent, being his coming 'in the air,' which is altogether distinct from the second stage in his advent, or his coming on to the earth. This second stage, or descent on the earth at Armageddon, is believed to occur about seven years, two months and ten days after the date of the expected Jewish covenant, whereas the coming 'in the air' appears to take place four or five years earlier. Though these calculations may not prove infallibly accurate to a day, yet it is believed that they will be found to be close approximations to the real fulfillment.

The precise periods of interval here stated are obtained by taking the literal-day accomplishment of the Apocalypse to be the exact counterpart of the year-day accomplishment, only on the scale of a day instead of a year. These points are illustrated by diagrams in a pamphlet, called 'The End of the World,' now being published by the Lecturer.

The great tribulation of three and a half years, during which this world is to become a complete hell, and the infidel antichrist image is to be universally worshiped throughout 'the earth,' is interposed between the first and second stage of Christ's advent, and is thought to be from 1865 to 1868. Previous to it, however, the wise virgins will be caught up to the heavens, among which favored number we should strive to be placed, by believing in and confessing definite Second Advent truth, and also by being truly born again, and obtaining full assurance that our sins are pardoned, and hearts changed through prayer to God in the name of Jesus, who has loved us and given himself for us, and is about to come again to receive us to himself."

Book Notices.

Wayside Gleanings: a collection of the miscellaneous writings of Fannie Parry, Pine Avenue, Sandy Hill, N. Y. Providence, R. I. Published by H. L. Hastings.

This is a neat and elegant 12 mo. volume just issued by H. L. Hastings. It contains several articles which have from time to time appeared in the columns of the "World's Crisis," and the readers of that will need no further information as to its character. Other pieces are added, both prose and poetry, and the whole compose an attractive and readable volume, well worthy of a place in Sunday Schools and private libraries.

The authoress was but a girl of twenty when she died, and hence the writings are but the first fruits of what might have been expected in maturer years. But she sleeps in Jesus, and her friends have gathered these memorials with the thought that some of the loved and loving friends of "Fannie P—" would be glad to secure a memento of one whose "lyre" is silent now in death.

We may observe that, as only 500 copies were ordered to be printed, those who wish for the book should obtain copies soon, as it is not stereotyped, and as no more will be issued. The mechanical execution of the book will compare favorably with the issues of leading publishers, and it would grace any of our tables or shelves. The price is 75 cts. It may be obtained of H. L. Hastings, Providence, R. I., J. Parry, Sandy Hill, N. Y., and also at this office.—o.

Hastings, author of several religious works of good repute, has just published a very interesting volume, under the title of "Thessalonica, or The Model Church.—A Sketch of Primitive Christianity." The subject is ably treated, and the volume will be found to be pleasant reading.—Albany Evening Journal.

Our Ecclesiastical Summary.

We find on our exchange list papers and periodicals giving an account of almost "all sorts and conditions of men." Among these publications, are Catholic and Protestant and some Orthodox and others heterodox; yet in all of them we find, at least occasionally, something good for the general reader, or something interesting. But to find it is the task, and a task, too, that none but an Editor can covet. These, as we are enabled to note them, we shall from time to time insert in our own columns, knowing we have generous minded patrons who are glad to know something outside the pale of our own denomination. So herewith we give the summary before us.

—— A noted Jesuit Father, Passaglia, recently published a pamphlet against the Pope's temporal power, for which he barely escaped being dragged to the Inquisition. He is now said to be at Florence editing a periodical favoring the separation of Church and State.

—— A notable diet of the churches of Scandinavia, recently met—including those of Holland, Norway, and Sweden. In the mercy of God, neither Romanism, nor rationalism, nor socinianism, has yet made inroads upon the churches of these States, as upon most others in Europe. But a somewhat novel fact is related of them. Within a few years past two notable men have arisen in their theological schools, the one being distinguished for his defence of conservative Lutheranism, and the other in nothing so much perhaps as in the belief that the "Apostles' creed" is inspired.

—— Brownson—formerly a Protestant, but for a few years past the able Editor of the leading Roman Catholic organ of this country—recently produced in his columns an article highly applauded by the secular press generally, advocating emancipation as the remedy for the present rebellion; but, to the great amazement of the public, he has been almost savagely attacked by his honored reverence, Archbishop Hughes. But political offences may be absolved in this country.

—— The protestant Episcopal bishop, (Whittingham,) of Maryland, has been openly and desperately attacked, in an ecclesiastical way, by the secessionists of his diocese, who seek his removal because he will not favor the rebellion.

—— Prof. Mattison—well known to our readers a few years since in our theological discussions—has recently left the M. E. Church, and become the pastor of the "St. John's Independent Methodist church" of New York. Among his published reasons for changing his relations, he says, he does not believe in "Deacons, Elders, and Bishops as they are found in fact in the M. E. Church;" but "like all Methodists throughout the world, the M. E. church excepted, I believe in but one order of the ministry." He further adds that, he believes "the ministry would be improved, and the churches more prosperous, if the pastoral relation was more real and permanent, and ministers and churches had more to do in the establishment. For, deny it as we may, it still remains a truth, coming to be seen and deplored more and more, that the growth of Methodism is mainly in new territory and in the rural districts; and that in nearly all large towns and cities it is comparatively weak and relatively declining." He finally says,—"I think less and less of mere sects, and more of Christianity and of Christ as I draw near to the grave."

—— "One hundred blessed each week on the average," says Mrs. Palmer. (See in another column, over the signature of M. D. W.) What think ye, practical believers in shut-door-ism, of such tidings?

—— Elder Knapp, celebrated a few years ago as a revival preacher among the Baptists, is said by the "N. Y. Independent" to have "given up his ministerial work, and is now engaged in cattle-selling at the West."

—— Bishop Polk, (Protestant Episcopal) of Louisiana, is now a Major General in the rebel army, and narrowly escaped losing his life in a recent battle.

—— We find in an exchange the following denominational statistics of Michigan. "Fifty years have rolled by since the first Protestant church was organized in Michigan. According to the statistics of the different religious denominations, there are now within the State 70,000 members, distributed as follows: Methodist Episcopal, 33,650; Presbyterian, 8,315; Baptist, (regular,) 13,011; Baptist, (Free-will,) 1000; Protestant Episcopal. 2,893; Congregational, 7,642; minor denominations—Wesleyans, Scotch Presbyterians, Protestant Methodist, United Brethren, 4,800. Total, 70,600. This, in a population of 750,000, gives one church-member to every ten and a half of the entire population of the State."

—— In the following we get a clue to how Roman Catholics "count" in the U. S. A. The N. Y. Tablet (R. C.) remarks as follows:—"Here, then, we see that whilst there is scarce a quarter of a million Catholics in all the seceding States, there must be over three millions scattered over the loyal States, and that the Northern and Western States contain the great mass of our people. In fact, there are more Catholics in New York city than in all the seceding States—there are said to be from 250,000 to 300,000 in this city alone, whilst we have seen that the whole South contains some thousands less than a quarter of a million Where, then, we again ask, should the sympathy of Canadian Catholics turn?"—M.

PENOBSCOT TOUR.

By request of Eld. Thos. Smith, I have visited the Penobscot River and Bay to preach "the word of the kingdom." Taking boat at Portland for Bangor, the "Daniel Webster," Oct. 24th, I arrived the morning of the 25th, and found Eld.'s Smith and Jones waiting to welcome me on this my first visit to this city, and region of Maine. I accompanied Bro. Smith to his hospitable home, learning that Bro. Jones contemplated at once the moving of his family to Connecticut, as his health was not sufficient to endure the cold seasons of the north-east. On arriving at the residence of Bro. Smith, he informed me that our meeting, which had been published to have commenced in Bangor, the 25th, had been postponed, owing to the fact that it conflicted with another published appointment, near by, of an Advent Conference, to be held at North Hermon; and the difficulty of obtaining a suitable place in B. for our meetings at this date. By postponing our meeting in Bangor a fortnight, we would be able to obtain and put in repair the old Free-will Baptist Chapel, which would make a convenient place for us, not only temporarily, but in the future, when we desired to hold meetings in the city. And I would here observe, that we have now in Bangor a door open to preach the word; a good and convenient chapel, that can be occupied by any judicious and faithful preacher of our faith. May the Lord multiply and send forth such into this part of his vineyard, where they are so much needed.

The evening of the 25th, in company with Eld. Smith, we were in Holden, a distance of six miles from Bangor, filling an appointment previously made by Bro. Smith, in view of the deferring of our meeting in B. Here I was permitted to see and enjoy the hospitality of Bro. Isaac Clewley and family. Bro. C. I had seen in Providence, R. I., while I was pastor of the Advent church in that city, years ago. It was good to see and be welcomed to the home of this brother in Christ. Our meeting, which was held in the chapel near his residence, was a solemn and profitable one, and the friends seemed anxious for me to visit them again at no distant day.

The 26th, we directed our course to N. Hermon, to attend the Conference under the supervision of Elders Billings and Brown. With Eld. Billings I was not acquainted. I had some slight acquaintance with Bro. Brown, whom I had seen years ago. We hoped to meet these brethren in the ministry in brotherly affection, and co-operate with them in our one blessed work of saving men, and warning them to meet the approaching advent of the Judge. Though not as heartily received as we could have desired, yet we united with, and took part in their meetings, endeavoring to "keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." The following day, I ascertained, through the public remarks of Eld. Billings, the reason why there was not a mutual and cordial reception of us in their Conference. He made a statement of which I was before ignorant, namely, that there had been no intercourse or christian fellowship and co-operation between the brethren east, and on the Penobscot, and those on the Kennebeck and in the western part of the State, and that Bro. Fassett had been the first ministering brother in the State who had ventured over the dividing line, &c., &c. Thus I perceived, verily, that I had most unconsciously crossed "the impassable gulf" of the State, and was endeavoring to effect a union between "the Jews and Samaritans," who had no dealings with each other, of which I afterwards endeavored, in as brief and happy a manner as possible, to apprize them was wholly unintentional, and without any calculation as to attempting an intrusion on my part; and by remarks of christian salutation and fellowship, I endeavored to awaken in the minds of all a feeling of union and brotherly love with all the great body of Adventists in our State. I trust that our effort was not without good effect. One thing I know—my motive was pure; and I have an "unfeigned love for the brethren" everywhere; and I have ever acted on the principle of true christian union, as my brethren know all abroad.

On Sabbath evening, the 27th, I preached in a school house in an adjacent town. The congregation was small, but quite interested and thoughtful. Monday, the 28th, we rode six miles, to Ellingswood Corner, where I preached in the evening to an attentive audience. The meeting was solemn, and at the close the people were eager to receive the publications I distributed gratuitously among them. On our return, we stopped and gave them a second discourse, and hope the good seed will spring up in some hearts, and a harvest be gathered in the day of the Lord Jesus.

Bro. Smith being under the necessity of returning home to move his family, Bro. Rich kindly conveyed me on my way in his own conveyance to North Searsport, the place of my next appointment, when I put up with Bro. Walter Nichols, and shared the hospitalities of his kind family. This is a pilgrim's home indeed, and has been a resting place for many a weary Advent preacher. We held three meetings within two days, and found quite a spirit for a revival awakened. O that God would pour out his Spirit upon them and give them a shower in all that region. Here I met, for the first time, Bro. Nason, who has traveled extensively in our State, and suffered hardships for the truth's sake. The Lord reward him according to his works; and let not the brethren forget his labors of love.

On the last evening of our meeting a stranger arose, after I had closed my discourse, and stated that a mysterious providence had brought him to that place that evening; and that the discourse he had heard was as unexpected to him as "a clap of thunder from a clear sky in January." He spoke with considerable feeling and earnestness for himself and the people, hoping they would all improve from it, and that for himself, he meant to profit by what he had heard. Others followed in exhortation, and the meeting ended with a good, and, I trust, lasting impression upon all minds. At the close of the service, I distributed some tracts, and by request of Bro. Tripp accompanied him to his home, when the stranger of whom I have spoken, and a friend with him, tarried for the night, and thus I was permitted to converse with them respecting the things of the kingdom of God. His friend I ascertained was an unconverted man, but not without serious reflections concerning his soul's interest. He was anxious for me to remember him in prayer, and solicitous that I should visit his town and preach the word of life to his neighbors. I gave him encouragement that in my next visit East, I would come to his place and hold a series of meetings.

The 31st, being again joined by Bro. Smith, we rode a distance of near forty miles, to attend our next appointment, which was at South Hope. We arrived just before the evening service, weary and cold, but being refreshed through the kindness of Bro. and Sr. Lawrence, we went to our appointment, where we found our congregation made up of a mixed and uneasy multitude, who, at first, were disposed to be disorderly, but afterwards became more quiet and gave some attention to the preaching. On Friday P. M., Bro. Smith baptized a sister who had neglected obedience to this ordinance for some time, but now went forward cheerfully in obedience to the Lord's command. There are others in Hope who need to confess Christ openly, and who, I trust, will on the first opportunity obey Christ in confessing him before the world. The Lord give them grace and faith and fortitude when they seek for them, that they may be blest of him, and receive eternal life.

Nov. 4th. We commenced a meeting in Rockport, on the Penobscot Bay, in the Methodist Chapel, which had been secured for us by Dr. H. B. Eaton, a physician of the place, and now a member of the Methodist church, but an Adventist in faith. He wrote us to visit their town, and that he had secured the chapel for three evenings, and he wished me to lecture upon the following subjects:—"The signs of the times," "The prophetic dates," "The new heavens and earth." With this order, I complied, and our audience each evening was good, and very attentive. We gave notice at the close of each service, that we had tracts for distribution, and those who wished to read them could make their selection; and the audience availed themselves of the favor, with apparent desire to know more of our faith and hope. The Congregational, the Baptist, and Methodist clergymen were out on one or more of the evenings. The two first called upon us at Drs Eaton's, by his invitation, on Wednesday P. M., with whom we spent a few hours in pleasant conversation upon the doctrines of the Advent faith. The Methodist clergyman had no desire to see us, and was apparently opposed. Our interview with the above clergymen was very profitable, and, were it proper, and had I space, I would be glad to mention our interview at length; but I must forbear. This meeting will not soon be forgotten by those present. The Spirit of God seemed to convince those who heard the truth of these things. Dr. Eaton seemed much interested and strengthened, and on the morning of our departure, we bade adieu to him with a degree of satisfaction that, in the providence of God, we were permitted to form this christian acquaintance with him and his companion in life. The morning of our departure we rode a distance of seven miles before breakfast, to the residence of Bro. Moses Young, of Lincolnville, where we were permitted to enjoy the privilege of sitting at his hospitable table and bowing around their family altar. Our next visit to this region will be one of longer continuance, as we have engaged to hold meetings in this place. Hope there will be a good attendance and good done.

Arriving at Bangor the morning of the 8th inst., which was the beginning of our meeting in this city, according to postponement, we went up to the chapel at the hour of service, and found it fitted up most conveniently for our meetings. There were, however, but few present; but our hearts were not discouraged; we hoped on. In the afternoon, I was to have preached, but the audience was so small, we concluded to have prayer and conference again. In the evening, we had more than during the day, but as to numbers, we were disappointed again. However, I preached, hoping good to be done. On Saturday, there was an increase of interest; and on Sunday, we had good audiences during the day. The services were characterized by interest and solemnity. The Spirit of God was present to convince the people of the truths we preached.

On Sunday evening, we had a large and attentive audience, who listened intelligently to the discourse delivered. God was with us, and victory turned on Zion's side. At the close of the service, and when the congregation had nearly dispersed, Satan put it into the heart of some of his children and servants to aim a stone of six or eight ounces in weight at the head of the speaker, but providentially I just leaned forward at the moment and escaped any injury. The Lord forgive the trespasser, and lead him to repentance.

Thus closed my first tour East, and on the Penobscot, which was one of much interest to me. Bro. Thos. Smith has my thanks for his brotherly kindness in accompanying and aiding me on my mission. The brethren and sisters who have administered to my temporal comfort are remembered in much love. The Lord reward them in the day of the Lord Jesus. Dr. Lewis Watson, and Bro. Higgins of Bangor, have my thanks and christian love for their aid in sustaining our meetings in that city. Love and christian salutation to all the brethren and sisters whom I have seen during my journey East.

Correspondence.

From C. A. S.

To the Editor of the Crisis:—I suppose that I am indebted to Miles Grant for the regular receipt of your paper. I take great pleasure, and derive perhaps some benefit from reading its contents. Although I have come to the belief that in its character it is bound to the expression of certain erroneous doctrines—false, as I view them—it evidently holds fast in godly sincerity to that which constitutes the basis of the grand superstructure of religious truth.

In the course of some random reading a few days ago, I came across the subjoined paragraph in "Arnold's Lectures on Modern History." Arnold was a profound master in historical research, and a scholar full of pious humility. In his Inaugural Lecture, in a course at Oxford University, on Modern History, he says (p. 46):—

"This leads us to a view of modern history which cannot indeed be confidently relied upon, but which still impresses the mind with an imagination, if not a conviction, of its reality. I mean, that modern history appears to be not only a step in advance of ancient history, but the last step; it appears to bear marks of the fulness of time, as if there would be no future history beyond it. For the last 1500 years, Greece has fed the human intellect; Rome, taught by Greece and improving upon her teacher, has been the source of Law and Government and social civilization; and what neither Greece nor Rome could furnish, the perfection of moral truth, has been given by christianity. * * * Now looking anxiously round the world for any new traces which may receive the seed (so to speak) of our present history into a kindly yet a vigorous soil, and may reproduce it, the same and yet new, for a future period, we know not where such are to be found. * * Everywhere the search has been made, and the report has been received; we have the full amount of earth's resources before us, and they seem inadequate to supply life for a third period of human history."

I look with especial interest for the contributions of "H. L. H." in your paper. Much I regret my failure to meet him while in the States a few months ago. He always describes a point, and speaks to it; a little too pertly sometimes, perhaps, but always intelligibly and instructively. I should like to hear his views of the "Trinity" through the Crisis.

Naturalism, in its worst form, abounds in these parts, and the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked seems most distasteful to the public. No public preaching of the truth is had here, but I have circulated some tracts on the major questions, and I know that they have had an awakening effect in certain instances. I cannot think that it will be a long time before the "indescribable soul" theory will fall under the feet of all intelligent minds, as well as receive positive and abhorrent recantation from the great body of enlightened christians. It is evidently that beastly lie which Vinet unwittingly apprehended, as underlying orthodoxism. A feeling that we are in the last days seems very prevalent, even among defiantly unholy men; and those who seem with sincerity to reject such an idea are also, apparently, devoid of all faith or hope in a christian sense. I speak of my personal observation hereabouts. It would, I verily believe, prove a great stirring-up if some man should come and arise here and tell the Bible truth.

I notice that some of your correspondents speak of God as superceding or suspending nature, (or natural law,) in order to the performance of a miracle. Such cannot be the case. In miracle the higher law of the supernatural plays into the lines of natural law, and so accomplishes its end of marvel or extraordinary work. This is substantially the language of Dr. Horace Bushnell, who demonstrates this unanswerable argument.

San Francisco, Cal., Oct. 15, '61.

From D. H. Squire.

Dear Bro. Grant:—As you kindly requested of each of the "Brethren" to send in a few lines to the "Crisis," I (although one of the least of the humble followers of Him that was so meek and lowly,) am glad that I can add my voice with those that love the soon appearing of our Savior and King. I think that we have now no reason to doubt but that we are truly in the "last days," and that soon, yes, very soon, our "Life-Giver" will come and give deliverance to his people. How important it is then that we be found with the "wedding garment" on, that we may enter into the "marriage supper of the Lamb." May we improve all of the time that may be left us, and sound the alarm to a guilty world, that is waxing "worse and worse." May our prayers ascend frequently to the "throne of grace" for wisdom and strength to keep far from us the "spirit of the world;" and that we may daily be found walking in the strait and narrow road that leads to eternal life.

I hope that the Lord may give you wisdom to rightly divide the word of truth and that many, who look to you for counsel, may be much strengthened. Hoping to meet you and all that have loved God since the world began, I remain your brother in Christ.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in New Bedford, in the month of September last, Bro. James P. Baxter, aged 46.

In the death of this servant of God, the Church of Christ, and we may add, the city of New Bedford, has lost a man of incalculable worth. Intelligent, sober, and full of christian affection, few men have done more with the same opportunities to reflect honor upon the cause of Christ than he.

He was a man of affliction. In the last five years he lost a wife and six children, all with pulmonary consumption. Bro. Baxter died with the same.

The one verdict in the church, from which there was no dissent, was, "he was a laborer." Yet in his dying moments, his request was that they should put on his tomb-stone,—"When ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants." May God bless to us the remembrance of his zeal and of his meekness! He leaves a wife and many friends to mourn his loss.—n.

After an illness of three weeks, Sister Esther H Babcock, daughter of Charles and Martha P. Babcock, died at her father's house in East Greenwich, R. I., Oct. 4th, 1861, aged 38 years.

She professed faith in Christ and united with the Baptist Church, in South Kingston, R. I., in the year 1840. Her faith in Christ and the fruits of his grace in her, were manifested by untiring diligence in acts of kindness to all around. The sick blessed her, and she "went about doing good," humbly following the Divine Exemplar. Prevented by the violence of disease and ulceration in her head from speaking, or even exercising reason in most of her closing hours, she leaves no dying testimony of a Savior's love. Still her end was peace. In her last moments she said to her friends, "I want—I want—" as if she would speak to them some parting word—then, with a smile, she said, "How beautiful!" and having said this, she "fell asleep" without a shadow on her countenance.

"Who would not wish to die like those Whom God's own spirit deigns to bless,
To sink into that soft repose,
Then wake to perfect happiness."

To the broken-hearted parents, deprived of a staff and comforter, to the sorrowing brothers and sisters, weeping for one who had been to them a confident and counselor; and to the many friends and acquaintances who grieved at the loss of one whom all around seemed glad to love, I endeavored to speak consoling words, while considering the cause, the character, and the cure of death. May peace abide with the weeping ones till the morn of glory breaks death's sullen gloom!

H. L. H.

Providence, R. I., Nov. 13, 1861.

Brother David H. Butler, of Pleasant Valley, Conn., fell asleep in Jesus, Sept. 11th, 1861, in the forty-third year of his age.

For about nine years he had been waiting for the consolation of Israel, and looking for that "blessed hope," even the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ. For the last five years his labors had been abundant. Generous and kind-hearted, God's pilgrim servants have had much reason to remember and to love him. Gladly did he proclaim to sinners the grace of God, and aid others in doing the same blessed work according to his ability.

When his hope of living till death itself should die seemed blighted by the workings of consumption, he laid him down in peace to sleep. Bidding farewell to his loved wife and his five children, he trod the dark valley without fear, for the Shepherd was with him to comfort him with his rod and with his staff.

The writer's health and engagements at the Sandisfield campmeeting not permitting him to comply with Bro. Butler's request to attend his funeral, his colleague, Elder Joseph D. Brown, was selected to speak words of comfort and of hope on that occasion. His funeral was held in the Baptist church, and from words of his own selection. It was clearly shown by a workman that needed not to be ashamed, that, like the ancient patriarch in Peter's day, so now, "David is not ascended into the heavens," (Acts 2: 34,) but rather that he is "dead, and buried, and his sepulchre is with us."

May the Father of the fatherless and the widow's God give comfort to those who still linger about the saddened home, and preserve them all in the grace and peace of Christ to that soon-coming day, when they that "dwell in dust" shall "awake and sing"—

"Break from his throne, illustrious morn,
Attend, O earth, his sovereign word,
Restore thy trust, a glorious form
Shall then arise to meet the Lord.

Providence, R. I., Nov 13, 1861. H. L. H.

Died, Nov. 9th, 1861, at Portsmouth, N. H., Sr. Frances M., wife of F. E. Wood, aged 28 years and 10 months.

This beloved Sister died with hemorrhage of the lungs. For some years she has had turns of bleeding, and the long continued congestion of her lungs resulted in consumption. However, she was quite comfortable—able to walk about and out in the air to the last. They were making arrangements to go to the island of Cuba to spend the winter, thinking a warmer climate might counteract the strong tendency to the lungs and result favorably. But disease had obtained a strong hold, and, to the surprise of all, she was taken bleeding at the silent hour of midnight. She arose from her bed, walked into the adjoining room, took her seat, and spoke to her husband thus,—"Call my brother, for I am dying." Although those words fell like a thunderbolt on his ear, yet ever living hope looked for a revival, as often times before; but, alas, the words were too painfully true! No revival came, but with these last words came her last breath—full of blood, and without a struggle, she "fell on sleep."

Sister Wood and husband embraced the Savior in 1853. In the providence of God, their steps were directed to this place, where they heard the glorious news of the Savior's return and its kindred doctrines; viz., sleep of the saints, destruction of the wicked, the earth restored to its Eden state, and other truth. Perceiving their harmony, and by prayerfully testing them by the sure word, they embraced them. They were baptized by Bro. Bishop, and on their way rejoiced in view of the reward that our Lord was soon to bring.

Her life was in harmony with her faith, as all truths were not only held in her judgment, but took a deep hold on her affections; hence became practical in her life. Notwithstanding she rejoiced in the gospel of the grace of God, she deprecated death, and had no more love for it than the prophet Isaiah; believing it held a near relation to sin, hence, as the apostle says, an "enemy." She loved the house of prayer and means of grace, and improved the privilege of speaking for Jesus, not forgetting to warn sinners of their danger and approaching doom. Her voice is silent, yet her warnings speak still. Her presence is taken from us, yet memory will not soon forget her precept and example.

She has left a husband, mother, brothers and kindred, with the church, to mourn her loss. May this affliction be sanctified to all, and they be prepared to meet her in the coming kingdom. Funeral attended by the writer.

W. P.

Died, at Moxville, Jo Davies Co., Ill., Oct. 37th, Eld. Robert Crown, aged 51 years and 11 months. Sermon preached by S. G. Clark.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the arrival of the Etna, we have advices from Liverpool to the 13th inst. and Queenstown the 14th.

Three British men-of-war are ready to sail for Mexico, but are detained, owing to stormy weather. The French ships are ordered to sail immediately.

It is reported that it was at the instigation of England that the American Government is to be invited to join the Mexican expedition. Spanish journals talk of a probable Spanish protectorate, as the result of the expedition.

The King of Portugal died of typhus fever on the 12th. The Duke of Oporto has succeeded to the throne.

A meeting of the French Senate has been called for December.

Geoffrey St. Hilaire, the celebrated naturalist, is dead.

There have been numerous arrests among the Jewish Rabbi at Warsaw.

TURKEY.

News from Syria that Davoud Pasha had become a French tool, caused great excitement.

Russia appears to be drawing toward a great crisis. A letter from St. Petersburg, Oct. 31, says

"Absent from St. Petersburg for the last two months, I have traveled through a great part of Russia, and I can assure you that this country is progressing toward a revolution such as that of 1793 will give you but a very faint idea. At no previous period has popular agitation reached such a height, nor never was it so universal, as I can vouch, as it is at present. The peasants are exasperated against their ex-owners, whom they accuse of not having fulfilled the wishes of the Czar, who commanded them, according to the peasants' statement, to cede the entire of their lands to their ancient serfs. The landed proprietors, on their part, are furious with the Emperor and his counsellors for having stripped them, arbitrarily, of a fortune of which the annual income is estimated at five millards of francs. The manufacturers and merchants are the more indisposed against the government as its ill-calculated measures have ruined both manufacturers' industry and trade to such a degree that nobody can foresee the period at which commercial transactions will recover their former elasticity. In a word, I have everywhere found discontent, violent irritation and implacable hatred among all classes of the population, one against the other, and of all classes against the government."

The Times says it should not be surprised if in a short time intelligence from Russia were to become more interesting and exciting. Things were moving on gradually but decidedly toward a tremendous crisis. The present policy of the Russian Government is exactly that which ordinarily goes before great misfortunes. St. Petersburg and Warsaw are each agitated by popular convulsions which would never have existed had the Government been either more thoroughly popular or more consistently coercive.

Another French International Exhibition. While the great International Exhibition in London is proceeding with all the speed that men, money and taste can impart to it, a great French Exhibition is announced to open three years later—namely, in 1865. The last French Exhibition, it will be remembered, took place in the midst of the war which England and France waged against Russia in 1855. The Emperor was advised, in consequence of the war, to postpone it, but as he had pledged his word that it should open, come what might, he was determined to redeem his promise, and he did so. It now appears that the next decennial exhibition in France is to surpass in beauty and magnificence all that has hitherto been attempted in that or in any other nation, and to give becoming eclat to the event, the Emperor has employed Sir Joseph Paxton, who designed the great building in Hyde Park in 1851, to prepare plans for the new erection. It is to be a crystal edifice with a dome 500 feet high, and large enough to enclose both of those in course of erection at South Kensington. To impress visitors to the London Exhibition next year with the beauties of this great structure, a plan of it will be exhibited in that building at the opening in May next, and ample space will be reserved for all countries without stint. The situation will be near the Palace of St. Cloud, a short distance from Paris, but easily accessible by rail.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

Another Expedition Preparing.—New York, Nov. 20.—The Times' Port Royal correspondent says the fleet is to be divided, and the following transports are to convey six thousand men to open another port: the Star of the South, Empire City, Roanoke, Ariel, Daniel Webster, Cahawba, Oriental, Matanzas, Marion, Philadelphia, Potomac, Ben Deford, Parkersburg, and Locust Point. The Wabash and Susquehanna and the other men of war accompany the expedition, leaving only two gunboats here. The transports are now taking in water for fifteen days. There is sufficient cotton here and on Pope Island, unginned, to make three thousand bales, and the corn houses are filled to the top, say ten thousand bushels in the ear.

Capture of Officers and Arms. New York, Nov. 25.—A Baltimore special to the Herald states that dispatches to General Dix from Eastern Virginia announce the capture of three rebel officers—a captain and two lieutenants—and seven cannon, all new and in good order. All traces of disloyalty seem to have disappeared in both counties. County meetings will be held to-morrow to renew their allegiance to the Federal government. The people will first adopt the State government of Western Virginia as a temporary measure, and then look to legislation by that State and Maryland for annexation to the latter. The Secretary of the Treasury has ordered the restoration of the light on Cape Charles.

The Postmaster General has sent a special agent to renew postal connection with both counties.

New York, Nov. 19. A letter from Charleston, dated Oct. 3, via Havana, to a gentleman in England [illegible] sent here, was received yesterday.

The writer represents the condition of affairs as deplorable, business prostrate, provisions at starvation prices, and no prospect of a change for the better.

Jefferson City, Mo., Nov. 19. Valuable information reached here to-day that our cavalry, under Capt. Hough, had overtaken and captured the rebels who seized our supply train near Warrensburg, on Monday. One hundred and fifty prisoners were taken and the wagons recovered.

Fortress Monroe, Nov. 22. Several regiments have arrived from Baltimore and Annapolis within the last twenty-four hours. Old Point has assumed an unusually bustling appearance.

Formidable preparations are making for active operations, the theatre of which is undisclosed. The ferry boats in Hampton Roads are being heavily armed.

Washington, Nov. 23. The Richmond papers of Wednesday contain dispatches from the Confederate army that small pox, violent typhoid fever and black measles are prevailing with fearful mortality among the rebel troops near Bowling Green, Ky. Floyd's army had retreated four miles south of Raleigh. The Federals had been largely reinforced.

The Times' Washington dispatch says such information has been received by the military authorities in Washington as renders it probable that an attack may soon be made upon the national lines by the rebels.

Baltimore, Nov. 25. The Richmond Enquirer says the rebel Congress has passed a bill for the removal of the Capitol from Richmond to Nashville, Tennessee, and that Congress will soon assemble there.

New York, Nov. 25. The Tribune's Washington dispatch says the reports of the Secretaries approach completion. The great interest which the war will give to that of the War Secretary will be heightened by Mr. Cameron's distinct avowal of his policy of placing arms in the hands of slaves willing to use them for the cause of the Union.

A Call for Funds.

The publishing committee of the Christian Publication Society, deeply sensible of the fact that the time is short, and that our work must be done soon, or not at all, venture this appeal to those interested in disseminating divine truth through the press.

We purpose to commence at once the publication of Tracts upon important Scriptural topics, of vital interest to the church of God in these times of peril and dismay. We wish to present to the household of faith "meat in due season." We wish to scatter light among the benighted of the earth, and so sound out the word of the Lord.

To do this on a scale answering at all to immediate necessities, we propose to raise at once Five Hundred Dollars, ($500) by special contributions, for this object. This money is designed to obtain and publish tracts, new and old, adapted to the times in which we live. We who engage in the work as publishing committee have no salaries or pay whatever for our services, and we mean that every dollar contributed shall tell in the great work. Each tract will be submitted to the careful examination and judgment of our Editorial Committee, H. L. Hastings, H. F. Carpenter and D. T. Taylor, in whose judgment, ability and prudence the churches can safely confide. Only such tracts as they shall approve will be published by the Society. We expect to furnish tracts cheaper than any Tract Society in the country, and our surplus, beyond the actual expenses of issuing them, will be devoted to the purpose of furnishing tracts for gratuitous circulation, or wherever they may be needed.

Brethren, will you help us in this work? Will you give us money? Or will you send us $100, $50, $20, or $10, to be repaid in Tracts, at cheap rates, when you shall choose to order them? We wish this work to move on at once. We therefore call for $500, and pledge ourselves to see it used in a manner that shall tend to accomplish the desired object. We do not wish to divert the funds of the World's Crisis for this work, nor has its treasury sufficient money that can be spared for this purpose. We call upon all interested in publishing and scattering cheap Tracts, to contribute for this object. Will not preachers take hold of it? Will not churches make collections and remit them?

No fear need be entertained that the work will be delayed. As soon as a portion of it is raised, and tracts are prepared, it can begin, and each dollar added will facilitate the object and extend the operations of the society. Come, then, to the work. Send us donations, pledges, or loans, to be repaid in publications, in amounts from a hundred dollars to a widow's mite; and with them let your prayers ascend, that God's blessing may attend our efforts and crown them with success. Monies should be sent to Miles Grant, Editor of the World's Crisis, Boston, Mass.

If more than one manuscript is retained, satisfactory payment will be made for the same. Rejected MSS. are to be at their author's disposal, and the committee may reject all if thought best by them.

For the Crisis.

Come, Savior, Come.

BY S. A. BREWER.

Tune.—"My Willie's on the dark blue sea."

My eyes are lifted up to thee,
O come, my Savior, come,
Thy sacred face I long to see,
And rest with thee at home.

Chorus.
Then come, Savior, come, we long to see
The sceptre in thy hand,
And take thy waiting ones with thee,
To dwell in Beulah's land.

Thy weeping bride, now saddened, sees
The war King lift his hand,
A shout for blood floats on the breeze,
Distress is in the land.

Chorus.
We know the kingdom's drawing near,
All things proclaim it nigh,
We watch to see thy sign appear
With glory in the sky.

Chorus.
We long to see thy saints awake,
A pure and spotless throng;
And the bright morn of glory break
And join the Jubal song.

Chorus.
There saints and martyrs all shall meet
Upon that peaceful shore,
And friends and kindreds all shall meet
In life forevermore.

Chorus.

For the Crisis.

A Glance at our World—No. 1.

Does not our present earth give signs of woe and old age, fickleness and disease? Yes! like a hypochondriac, it has ill turns or paroxisms, when it will rouse the ocean into a tempest, make sport of navies, putting sailors to their wit's end, and strewing the shore with fragments and carcasses of men; at other times, to exhibit some feat of power, will rock a continent or sink an island, and, with a giant strength, shake a massive city into a ruin, utterly burying its wretched inhabitants; soon is sick and writhes and groans as in mortal agony, and finds relief only by disgorging its fiery bowels, burying villages and cities in burning graves. Again, the elements are restive and unsettled and cannot preserve a due medium. They suffocate you with sultry calms, or consolidate their strength into a tornado and sweep the country with the besom of destruction. And the climates of the earth—how ungenial! The extremes—one frigid—the temperate fickle—the tropics oppressive. The oblique position of the earth precludes the possibility of a better climate, and man groans on, hoping for better times in this wicked, sin-cursed earth; but this hope is fallacious. Try it; make yourself master of all science, the politics and laws of all nations; secure the suffrage of a whole country; succeed to the highest pinnacle of power and fame, and receive the homage of the whole world, and what have you but a barren rock, too narrow for friendship, and too slippery for public repose. The envious eyes of the ambitious will be upon you, watching for your halting; the inquisitive meddlings of the fastidious will tease and perplex you, and will make you responsible for almost every local accident and mishap that may occur, and even their own personal failures; and there are those always ready to displease you as soon as they can, and make you with disgrace take the lowest seat. The same liability to disappointment attends other callings and professions. Any success that may be secured cannot be a bar to disappointment, reverse and death. This has been the allotment of past ages, and will be of the future, till the redemption of the body, and the restitution of all things. How few succeed to wealth, fame, power, in any country. The great bulk are doomed to live by the day, to work hard for a precarious living. Their wages are seldom equal to the expense of high rent, fuel, food, clothing, and the doctor's bill.

In countries less privileged, things are proportionately worse. In England, masses of laboring people are glad to work for from one shilling to three a day; and in manufacturing towns there are thousands that make a bare subsistence by observing an economy that is mean and distressing; and at every reverse—changes in the price of cotton or stocks, or some other changes—those thousands are thrown out of employment and become so many miserable paupers. Imagine the mortification, shame and trial of such destitution!—haggard countenances, ragged, neglected, ignorant, and wicked children. Besides this, the swarms of beggars form a considerable portion of the whole population; and so these wretches swell Nature's groans for deliverance.

And what is the hope of these lowly millions? Can the church's millennium help them? No! the very supporters of this fable are their oppressors, who care not for their souls, though under their eyes, but will raise funds to convert the heathen, and would, to gratify their cupidity, use them up in factories, and create for them the very liabilities that disgrace every civilized country under heaven. Step into the homes of these unfortunate people. What a scene is presented! Some stagger as they walk, from exhaustion and hunger,—children crying for bread,—some you may find eating their scanty meal, not knowing from whence the next is to come—perhaps they eat in quiet, or it may be an unquiet meal—mutual criminations go the rounds, and so embitter their poor repast;—others, perhaps, fear God, and are asking for daily bread, and sighing for a better day—a speedy redemption from present sorrow. Says Dr. Cheever, in a letter from Europe, "The English world might be compared to a string of men, each standing on the shoulders of the man below him, and all striving to get higher, but few or none reaching down or helping to lift up others. You will say it is so every where—the world is so. No deep English thinkers believe that the people have not spirit enough for a revolution if it were needed. The abuses of England have become so much a part of her life, that to cut them off would prove fatal, just as an inveterate and large opium taker would die if you stopped his poison. Reforms cannot go on slowly and SURELY at the same time. The Devil likes slow reforms."

A single glance at our world will convince any one who is open to conviction, that man is not happy; a feeling of uneasiness pervades the world. Go where you please, visit the nation enjoying the most genial climate and fruitful soil, where but little labor is bestowed to secure an ample living; yet we find them the most helpless and degraded of men, idle, violent, unjust, ignorant and impure. Palestine is overrun with pilgrims, idle monks, priests and beggars in general,—and so of Italy, and of the Indies, Africa, with the Turks and native Blacks, some of whom are cannibals. If you go into the latitudes (the same) in America, you will find slavery on the one hand a terrible blight, a curse and scandal to the government that tolerates it; and on the other hand, in South America, the people are crushed under priestly dominion, and degraded by superstition. If you go into the frigid zones of Europe, you will find in general the people reduced to serfdom, but little better than Slavery itself. Here the people are more industrious, but how poorly rewarded for their labor; they may not stipulate the conditions on which to work for their pampered lords. If you go to the extreme North, you may find the people more free and independent; but liberty here is no great privilege, for half their lives is spent in the deep excavation of ice and snow, living, as it were, in the regions of everlasting night and frost.

If you look at our own country, you will find the people the most industrious, virtuous, religious, of any portion of the earth, for the reason they could not exist without hard labor in the beginning, and now they think they cannot; hence where there are the fewest natural advantages in this world, with a good government, the people do the best; yet here things do not always go to please them,—they have trials with their neighbors, their children, their debtors, and their creditors; with the climate, the frosts, the winds, the rain, the drought, the pestilence, the war, and the invasion of Death. Here we are, on every part of this earth, in every clime, under every form of government,—all subject to every kind of fortune; our wants and circumstances diversified as our complexions and features. The lordly aristocrat is no better off than his slave. If the slave groans under the burden of toil, his master does under an indigested meal. If the slave smarts under the lash of the tyrant, the master does under the sharp rebuke of offended, insulted justice. If the slave goes to his cabin wearied with the labors of the day, he can enjoy the luxury of quiet sleep; but the master finds rest is labor,—and if the slave lies down an innocent man, his master has the forebodings of dreadful retribution upon an unquiet bed, haunted by fearful dreams. The Day of Christ "at hand" in the Apostolic Age—in What Sense?

The day of Christ was at hand 1800 years ago. Paul says, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." "The Lord is at hand." Peter says, "The end of all things is at hand." It is said in the Apocalypse, "The time is at hand." According to these passages, the day of Christ was at hand in some sense in the apostolic age. In what sense was it then at hand? It must, as it seems, have been at hand in one of two senses, either absolutely or relatively. It was not absolutely at hand, or it would have come in that age; and the apostle assures the Thessalonian Christians, that it was not at hand in that sense. After affirming the second advent, he said, "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand." It is worthy of remark, that the original word here rendered at hand, is not the same as is so rendered in the other passages above quoted; for in this passage, the word rendered "at hand," describes an event as imminent, or just ready to be introduced. He assigns his reasons. He tells them that there was to be "a falling away first," and the revelation of "that man of sin, the son of perdition," who was to have his time according to the sure word of the prophecy, and then be "consumed with the spirit of the Lord's mouth, and be destroyed with the brightness of his coming." Thus we are conducted to the conclusion that the day of the Lord was not absolutely at hand when the apostle wrote.

The end must therefore have been at hand in the other sense, viz., relatively; that is, the time to the end would be short compared with the period of the world's history then in the past. This principle of exegesis is virtually expressed in the following text: "And that knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed; the night is far spent, the day is at hand." It will be seen at once that the apostle is speaking relatively: he looks at the amount of the great night of this world then in the past; at the amount of night still in the future; and then, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, deliberately says, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." As though he had said, "We are far from the beginning of the night; we are near its end: the time till the morn of blessedness is short, compared with the long hours of night which are gone." Thus we are furnished with the principle of interpretation, that the day of Christ was at hand relatively in the apostolical age.

If so, where must we be now? Must not the comparatively small balance of "the night" which was then in the future, be about past? and must not the Sun of the eternal day soon, very soon arise? Must not the day of Christ, which was relatively near then, be absolutely so now? In short, is not the end of all things, in the very nature of the case, "nigh at hand?" But let us look at

OTHER PHRASES OF LIKE IMPORT.

There are other forms of expression in the New Testament to which persons generally attach no definite meaning; but which are plain and significant, in the light of the relative principles stated above. Some of them are found in the following class of passages: "A little while and ye shall not see me: and again a little while and ye shall see me." "For yet a little while and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh." "Behold the Judge standeth before the door." "Behold I come quickly." Those who lose sight of the relative principle suggested by the apostle, are forced to the conclusion that the advent referred to in the above passages, is some other event than the personal appearing of Christ, and is far in the past; but in view of this obvious principle of interpretation, we can easily understand the advent intended to be personal and future; though even on this principle it cannot be far distant, but must now be specially nigh.

Take also the following class of texts: "Brethren, the time is short." "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son;" intimating that the last days of the great week of the world's history had begun when our Redeemer was on earth. Peter, speaking of the first advent, says that Christ "was manifest in these last times for you." John, mentioning the developments of anti-christ which were then taking place, says, "whereby we know that it is the last time:" all of which forms of expression convey the idea that the closing period of the world's existence had dawned, and, if so, must now be near its termination.

Another form of expression is worthy of notice: the apostle, speaking of certain things which occurred under the old covenant, says, "They were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come," or as it has been rendered, "upon whom the last of the age is come." But in what sense were "the ends of the world," or "the last of the age," come upon them? May we not suppose it to be in the same sense that one feels that the end of a journey has come upon him when he has traveled more than two-thirds of the entire distance? When Paul penned the above passage, the church had journeyed, according to recent authors of great learning and investigation, nearly 4200 years; and this period, according to the above illustration, had brought her through more than the beginning and middle divisions of her journey: and if so must she not now be almost home? Is not the great wilderness nearly all behind? Is she not on the margin of the heavenly country? It seems that she may now sing with the understanding, as with the spirit:

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wishful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie."

We must call attention to another passage before closing. The apostle, in Heb. 9th, says: "Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." According to this, it was "in the end of the world" when the first advent took place. Some may suppose that the Jewish age is intended, but that this is not correct is obvious from the fact that the Jewish age commenced when God took the children of Israel by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, and terminated at the manifestation of the new covenant; whereas the apostle is here speaking of an age which began at the foundation of the world. The context fully verifies this statement. The previous verse reads, speaking of Christ, "Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with the blood of others; for then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world." The reader will notice that the starting point in the apostle's mind is the "foundation of the world." Then come the words under consideration, "but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself;" obviously meaning that in the close of the world or age, reckoning from the creation, our Saviour's first advent occurred. He then adds: "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation;" as he had said, instead of the Savior suffering annually, which would have occasioned his suffering very often from the beginning of the world, he delayed his coming till the end of time was approaching, when he came in humility, and offered himself as an atonement for sin, on the altar of the cross, and then, as it were, took the blood of his sacrifice and went within the veil to plead during the comparatively short interval which should intervene between his sufferings, and the actual end of the age, when he will make his second advent, without a sin-offering, and bless his waiting people with full salvation.

In conclusion we may safely remark:

1. The expressions, "the day at hand," "the end of all things is at hand," and similar ones, were not uttered at random, but on some definite principle.

2. The only principle suggested in the apostolical writings, is the relative principle, viz., that the time to the end of the age was short compared with the amount of time then in the past.

3. If this principle be well founded, then there cannot be a 1000 years of universal righteousness and peace before the end; but we must be occupying the closing hours of grace, and

"Not many years their round shall run,
Not many mornings rise,
Ere all the glory stands revealed
To our admiring eyes."

For the Crisis.

What is Life?

Is it life in sport to pass away
The hours of each succeeding day,
To quaff rich nectar from the cup,
Or of mingled wines often to sup,
To mix with the gay and merry crowd,
And hear the voice of laughter loud;
To see the toasts anon pass round,
And hear their echo's empty sound?
Is it life, in gaudy dress attired,
To be by all around admired,
To hear the fleeting breeze of fame
Follow awhile and gild our name;
To wear the diadems of earth,
And know naught else but ease and mirth;
To be the child of pomp and pride,
And fashion's votary beside?
O, no! there is no life in all
The noisy mirth or festive ball,
Each, evanescent as a dream,
Are borne along Time's rapid stream;
They quickly pass and ne'er return,
But sink into the silent urn
Of cold oblivion, where they wait
Their sure and lasting bitter fate.
O! then, if none or all of these,
The gentle morn or evening breeze,
Cannot to beings here below
Afford a joy unmix'd with woe,—
Then tell the source of lasting joy,
Of bliss, true bliss, without alloy!
The source of life is hid with God,
Made known through Jesus' precious blood,
Applied to cleanse the guilt of sin,
And form the heart anew within.
And then 'tis life to feel the while,
The Savior's fond, approving smile
Resting upon the broken heart,
Which joy and perfect bliss impart.
'Tis always life to walk with God,
And though we feel the chast'ning rod,
'Tis mercy that inflicts the blow,
That we may more of glory know;
'Tis only to refine the gold,
And purify in heaven's mould
The heart from all remaining dross,
And sanctifying every cross,
Our glorious change will quickly come,
And waft us to our blissful home.
[illegible]
Till Christ shall dry the last sad tear.

Selections.

Will you Enlist?

(Concluded.)

"You're rather hard there, comrade; but, now that your paper is finished, let me tell you that when I enlisted to serve my country I received clothing and arms, so that I am bound to serve truly, to fight my country's battles, and to shed my blood for the honor of the Union."

"And have you received nothing from the King of kings?"

"Not a thing."

"No? Why, who gave you your life, and all your faculties? Who made the sun and moon that light you by day and night? the beasts and the produce of the fields that supply you with food and raiment? Who gave his own Son, our Savior Jesus Christ, to die on the cross for sinners? Who bestowed on us that blessed book the Bible? and who has prepared a world of glory for every one that fights under his banner, and continues to be his faithful soldier till his life's end? Instead of not receiving any thing at his hands, you have received from him all you possess."

"You look so earnest at me, and speak in such a way, that I feel half afraid of you. To make me out a deserter, a rebel, and a traitor, is going too far. I don't see that I am worse than other folks, though I may not be any better. You make me out black indeed."

"Nay, comrade, I have only read the hand-bill to you, and if there is any thing there that touches you, I can only say the substance of it is from the Word of God. Now, supposing that you should get wounded—what will become of you?"

"Become of me? Why, I shall be taken care of, and have a pension, to be sure. Did you never hear of the Military Hospital? Old soldiers live there as happy as lords. Our government has taken care of that."

"And if you should live there as happy as a lord, you must die there at last; and what will become of you then? Has that been taken care of too?"

"How you talk! That's my lookout."

"I am glad you think so; and now tell me, comrade, what sort of a lookout you have."

"Why, that's a poser; but I reckon it will be with many of us as it is now; our rations will be much the same; I shall share as well as my comrades. It's a thing that I don't much care to think of. We must all die when our time comes—that's certain."

"The Bible says as much; but dying is not all: 'It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment.'"

"That is what Harry Towers tells us; but, as I said, I keep away from him."

"You may keep away from Harry Towers, but you can't keep away from the judgment-seat of Christ, comrade."

"You're right enough there. How do you manage that?"

"By fleeing for refuge to the stronghold; by acknowledging my sins, and seeking pardon through the death and intercession of the Captain of my salvation. The gospel of Christ is worth more than a thousand hospitals."

"But what is this gospel that you say so much about?"

"What is it? why, it would take the tongue of an angel, ay, an archangel, to tell you what it is. You must not expect that such a poor unlettered sinner as I am can tell you a hundredth part of what it is. However, as you ask me the question, I will not be quite silent about the matter. The gospel is the news of God's grace; it is tidings of great joy; it is medicine to the sick, a cordial to the faint, wine and oil to the wounded, food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, clothing to the naked, riches to the poor, a friend to the friendless, a home to the homeless; it is——"

"Halt! Why, your tongue runs as glibly as our corporal's when he reads the roll. I asked you but one question, and you have given me a dozen answers already."

"Well, hear me out: The gospel is a remedy for sin, a cure for sorrow, a life-purifier, a death-composer, a hope to the hopeless, a joy to the wretched, a remover of all things that stand between us and God, and a heaven to those who looked for nothing but weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

"A pretty good list, take it altogether; but a man must be a saint before he deserves these things."

"They are not deserved by a saint; but God, in his mercy, has promised them all to a repentant sinner. If you are once taught that you are a perishing sinner, and cry for mercy to the Father of mercies, you will not cry in vain. 'Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' Come, comrade, will you be a christian soldier? Will you enlist?"

"You're a queer man. I little thought what you were when I asked you to enlist as a soldier. If you'll give me that hand-bill, I'll try to spell it over at another time."

"Do, comrade, do, but one word before we part, for I must turn off here. Don't make a light matter of your eternal salvation. 'The Lord is nigh unto all that call upon him; to all that call upon him in truth. He will fulfill the desire of them that fear him; he also will hear their cry and will save them.' REMEMBER, THE GREAT REVIEW DAY IS AT HAND, WHEN THE JUDGE OF HEAVEN AND EARTH SHALL REND THE HEAVENS, AND COME DOWN IN MIGHT, MAJESTY, AND DOMINION, TO JUDGE THE ASSEMBLED WORLD STANDING BEFORE HIS THRONE. Then it will be seen whether we are true men or deserters and rebels. No question will be asked about uniform, but, Have we been faithful soldiers of Christ, ready to live and die in his service, willing to share his cross, and desiring to wear his crown?"

"Well, comrade, farewell. I'll be as good as my word, and spell over the hand-bill."

"Farewell; may the words be sent home to your heart, so that we may be soldiers of the same corps, and obey the same Captain."

"That's a good fellow, I'll be bound for it, and wishes well to a soldier. The truth's the truth, all the world over; and I do think that many of us are a heathenish, ungodly set of folks, and so I said, I'll spell the hand-bill over again; it may do me good. One thing I see now that I never saw before—that a man may be well armed who carries neither a musket nor bayonet, and that he may be a good soldier without being in uniform."

BORN 1602, DIED 1669.

1. Truth is the daughter of time; it will not always lie hid.

2. Crosses come thick; be patient!

3. Let us labor to be like unto angels, "strengthened with all might," walking about the world as conquerors, able to do all things through Christ who strengtheneth us.

4. Let no man envy others their better parts or places, since they have them on no other condition but to be put upon greater temptations, hotter services. If we could wish another man's honor, when we feel the weight of his cares, as David once did of Saul's armor, we should be glad to be in our own coat.

5. We know not what we lose by making haste, and not holding up our hands as Moses did, to the going down of the sun. If God have begun to enlarge us, he will in due time do it to the full, if we should not be in straits sometimes.

6. David saw the features of his friend Jonathan in lame Mephibosheth, and therefore loved him. He forgave Nabal at Abagail's intercession, and was pacified toward Absalom at Joab's. Pharaoh favored Jacob's house for Joseph's sake; shall not God do as much more for Jesus's sake? Joseph was well pleased with his brethren when they brought Benjamin. Bring but the child Jesus in our arms, as Simeon did, and he cannot but smile upon us. Were he never so much displeased before, yet, upon the sight of this his well-beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased, all shall be calm and quiet as the sea when once Jonah was cast into it.

7. Endure hardness. Never dream of a delicacy. Think not to find God in the garden of Egypt, whom Moses found not but in the burning bush. Many love Canaan, but loathe the wilderness; commend this country, but look upon the conquest as impossible; would sit in the seat of honor with Zebedee's children, but not drink the cup of affliction.

8. No wearing the crown, but by bearing the cross first. Christ himself was not glorified, till first crucified.

9. "And He will thoroughly purge his floor." That is, his church, called God's threshing-floor in Isaiah, because usually threshed by God with the flail of affliction. That is the way by which, or whereby, the Lord Christ doth purge his people, and separate between the son whom he loves and the sin which he hates. We may observe in this the difference between Christ and the tempter. Christ hath his fan in his hand, and he fanneth us; the Devil has a sieve in his hand, and he sifteth us. Now, a fan casteth out the worst, and keepeth in the best; a sieve keepeth in the worst, and casteth out the best. So Christ and his trials purgeth chaff and corruption out of us, and nourisheth and increases his graces in us. Contrawise, the Devil, what evil soever is in us, he confirmeth it; what faith or good thing soever, he weakeneth it.

Everlasting Punishment.

The different views concerning the future state held by the Christian Church may be thus classified, arranging them, exhaustively, under eight divisions:

I. The Roman Catholic Church makes three conditions hereafter, namely:
1. Everlasting joy.
2. Everlasting suffering.
3. Temporary sorrow in purgatory.

II. The orthodox Protestant Church makes two conditions hereafter, namely:
1. Infinite and eternal joy.
2. Infinite and eternal suffering.

III. The old-school Universalists make one condition hereafter, namely:
1. Eternal joy.

IV. New-school Universalists and Restorationists make two conditions hereafter, namely:
1. Eternal joy.
2. Temporary and finite suffering.

V. Unitarians make an indefinite number of conditions hereafter, according to the various characters and moral status of men.

VI. The Swedenborgians make an indefinite but limited number of heavens and hells, suited to the varieties of character, but having a super-natural origin.

VII. The Spiritualists make the other world like this world, with no essential differences, making it a continuation of the natural life.

VIII. The Annihilationists believe that the finally impenitent will perish wholly, and come to nothing.—Christian Intelligencer.

A SHORT SERMON.—Keep out of debt. Avoid it as you would war, pestilence and famine. Hate it with a perfect hatred. Abhor it with an entire abhorrence. Dig potatoes, break stones, peddle tin-ware. Do anything that is honest and useful, rather than run into debt. As you value good digestion, a healthy appetite, a placid temper, a smooth pillow, pleasant dreams, and happy wakenings, keep out of debt. Debt is the hardest of all taskmasters, the most cruel of all oppressors. It is a millstone about the neck. It is an incubus on the heart. It spreads a cloud over the firmament of man's being. It furrows the forehead with premature wrinkles; it plucks from the eye its light; it drags all nobleness and kindness out of the port and bearing of man. It takes all the soul out of his laugh, and all stateliness out of his walk. Come not under its accursed dominion, nor ever be its slave. Owe no man anything.

☞ Words are nice things, but they strike hard. We wield them so easily that we are apt to forget their hidden power. Fitly spoken, they fall like the sunshine, the dew, and the summer rain—but when unfitly, like the frost, the hail, and the desolating tempest.

Hygiene.

"This is for your health."—PAUL.

Precautions.

1. Never sleep in a room where there is any green paper on the walls, as this color is made of arsenic or lead; the former is by far the most dangerous, being scheeles green, and is known positively by a drop of muriatic acid on the green leaving it white.

2. White glazed visiting-cards contain sugar of lead, and will poison a child who is tempted to chew them from the slight sweetish taste.

3. Green glazed cards used for concert-tickets, are still more poisonous; a single one of them contains a grain and a half of arsenic, enough to kill a child.

4. Never put a pin in the mouth or between the teeth, for a single instant, because a sudden effort to laugh or speak, may convey it into the throat, or lungs, or stomach, causing death in a few minutes, or requiring the windpipe to be cut open to get it out; if it has passed into the stomach, it may, as it has done, cause years of suffering, ceasing only when it has made its way out of the body through the walls of the abdomen or other portion of the system.

5. It is best to have no button or string about any garment worn during the night. A long, loose night-gown is the best thing to sleep in. Many a man has facilitated an attack of apoplexy by buttoning his shirt-collar.

6. If you wake up of a cold night, and find yourself very restless, get out of bed, and standing on a piece of carpet or cloth of any kind, spend five or ten minutes in rubbing the whole body vigorously and rapidly with the hands, having previously thrown the bed clothing towards the foot of the bed so as to air both bed and body.

If you find that you have inadvertently eaten too much, instead of taking something to settle the stomach, thus adding to the load under which it already labors, take a continuous walk with just enough activity to keep up a very slight moisture or perspiration on the skin, and do not stop until entirely relieved, but end your exercise in a warm room, so as to cool off very slowly.

8. Never put on a pair of new boots or shoes on a journey, especially on a visit to the city; rather wear your easiest, oldest pair, otherwise you will soon be painfully disabled.

9. A loosely-fitting boot or shoe, while traveling in winter, will keep the feet warmer without any stockings at all, than a light pair, over the thickest, warmest hose.

10. Riding against a cold wind, immediately after singing or speaking in public, is suicide.

11. Many public speakers have been disabled for life by speaking under a hoarseness of voice.

12. If you happen to get wet in cold weather, keep moving on foot with a rapidity sufficient to keep off a feeling of chilliness until you get into a house, and not waiting to undress, drink instantly and plentifully of hot tea of some sort; then undress, wipe dry quickly, and put on warm, dry clothing.

13. Never go to bed with cold feet, if you want to sleep well.

14. If a person faints, place him instantly flat on a bed, or floor, or earth, on his back, and quietly let him alone at least for ten minutes; if it is simply a fainting-fit, the blood, flowing on a level, will more speedily equalize itself throughout the system; cold water dashed in the face, or a sitting position are unnecessary and pernicious.

15. Never blow your nose, nor spit the product of a cough, nor throw a fruit-peel on the sidewalk.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Digestion and Repose of Mind.

There is one more element which plays a most important part in digestion, and that is the state of the nervous system. More often than men think, the seat of their digestive difficulties lies neither on their tables nor in their stomachs, but in their brain. Worry, agitation, oppression with care, restlessness of aim, a monotonous or despondent life, all these express themselves in capricious appetites and undigested food. Very often, too, a remedy for these evils is vainly sought in change or restriction of a diet by no means particularly faulty. The influence of the mental state upon the disposal of the food has been demonstrated in the case of prisoners. The depression attending the prison-life, has made absolutely indispensable a compensation, in the form of a more liberal diet, for those whose sentence extends over any considerable period; and thus has risen the comparative good feeding of the criminal, as compared with other classes of the community, which has sometimes excited so much comment. In his heavy mental atmosphere, the prisoner languishes upon a diet which might suffice a hope and home-cheered man with the same amount of work.

How to Preserve the Teeth.

The mouth is a very warm place—98 degrees Fahrenheit. In this northern climate we have a temperature so high in the shade, even at ninety, beef will begin to decompose in twenty-four hours. The particles of beef and other food which are left between the teeth begin to putrefy before dinner the next day. If you then pick the teeth the odor of the breath tends to decomposition. With this management we ought not to be surprised that the gums and teeth should become the subjects of disease. What is to be done?

Use the tooth-pick (goose-quill) after each meal. Follow with a mouthful or two of water, to remove the particles the tooth-pick may have left behind.

With these simple things thoroughly done you will preserve the teeth to old age.

THE CANCER.—In answer to the inquiry in the Crisis a few weeks since, as to what would cure a Cancer, I would offer the following, and ask the Crisis to copy:—

"Take ripe Polk-berries; squeeze the juice out on a pewter plate, (if that is not at hand, take a new tin plate,) and place it in the heat of the sun or under a stove, and stir with a stick of brimstone till it becomes a salve."

There is a woman here, of my acquaintance, an Advent Sr. (Mrs. Barnes) who had the worst form of cancer in the breast. I thought she could not live but a short time; but from the use of this salve she is getting well. No one need fear to use it. Spread the salve on cloth and lay on the cancer. ALEX. McCLURE.

LOW-NECKED DRESSES.—Bishop Timon, of Western New York, has issued a letter addressed "to the honored and pious christian women of the diocese" upon a subject which he has long refrained to touch, though pressed apparently by divine impulse,—low-necked dresses. He discoursed at much length on the modesty of dress, quoting largely from the Scriptures on the score of morality, and from the writings of Catherine Beecher, Dr. Ellis and others, as respects health. The Bishop trusts that christian ladies will receive his advice in the spirit in which it is given, and directs that the pastors under his charge touch upon the subject in their discourses.

☞ THE CRISIS is devoted to the exposition of all Bible truth: especially, the doctrine of the immediate, personal coming and reign of Christ on the earth; holiness of heart; the unconscious state of the dead; their literal resurrection, and the final destruction of the wicked.

For the Crisis.

Be not Afraid.

Art toiling on life's changing sea,
Deep waters dark encircling thee,
The storm-king bold 'gainst thee arrayed?
Then listen while you faithful pray,
And hear your Savior sweetly say,—
"I'm with thee still, be not afraid!"

Art by temptation rudely tossed,
Near dashing 'gainst the rock-bound coast,
Thy 'wildered heart by fear dismayed?
Grasp closer still your Father's hand,
He'll steer your bark from off the strand,
And guide you home—be not afraid.

Art sinking 'neath affliction's wave?
Art drifting near the yawning grave,
Where cold and still the dead are laid?
Believe in Christ, who says, "I'll come
And raise your body from the tomb"—
Trust ye in God, be not afraid!

Along the voyage of life, each day
New clouds hang threat'ning o'er our way,
Our hopes like shadows fade,—
Unless we meekly trust in God,
And look beyond the chast'ning rod,
To Him who said, "be not afraid!"

The Pastoral Work, and the Various Gifts in the Church.

BY H. L. HASTINGS.

In these days of corruption and degeneracy, while almost everything pertaining to the gospel of Christ is perverted, few things lie in the minds of the common people and the church more entirely contrary to the teachings of the New Testament, than the common theory of the pastoral office. There is but one place in our version of the New Testament, where the word pastors occurs, (and it being a Latin word, it has a very poor right to be even there,) and yet upon this simple, single untranslated word, rests a vast system of pastorship as different from the gospel as the philosophy of Plato is from the preaching of Paul. But, says one, "Does not Paul tell us of apostles, prophets and evangelists, and pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints?" Certainly he does; but that he meant by them what you mean when you use the same words, remains to be seen. You mean by an "evangelist" a man who, having no settled preaching place, runs up and down in the world where God sends him, and the people need him; preaches the word of God, takes for it what men give him, and lives on that if he can, and if not, earns more; endures privation, wears his old clothes till patched, perhaps, and ragged; wears himself out in the Master's cause; goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed; faces scorn and contempt, storm and tempest; sings gladness to many a tearful pilgrim's heart,—cannot be bought or hired to leave his work, and finally dies on the field with his harness on. This man is an evangelist in your opinion. And so no doubt he is, and as such will receive divine blessing and reward at the appearing of Christ.

But how about a pastor? Well, a pastor, a "settled pastor," as the phrase runs in common talk,—for we never read of a "settled pastor" in all the Bible,—a settled pastor is one who, from being wearied with preaching all over the land, or from a natural aversion to trying the rough usage incident to that sort of labor, or from feeble health, or from a desire for steady pay, or more of it, or from a sincere and special love for the souls within a certain town, parish, or village, has, in some way, either by his preaching, or his politeness, or his learning, or his reputation, or his general excellence of character, convinced the majority, or the rich portion of some local church, that it would be a fine thing for them to have such a man as he is live in their neighborhood, talk to them two or three times a week, visit in their houses, take tea with their families, attend the sewing societies, the prayer meetings, the church fairs and the levees, the weddings, the funerals, &c., and finally, to be their pastor. Moreover they have found that he will come and live comfortably with them, as becomes a disciple of Him who had not where to lay his head, preach to them of the dangers of loving money, getting sleepy, careless and worldly, and try by all lawful means to save them from hell for the sum of five, ten, twenty, fifty, or an hundred dollars a week in cash. But if they think the price too high, that their bargain would be a hard one, then they can go to hell if they choose to and deserve to, while he will go where he can get that amount of money, either in some other place, or at some other business. The "settled pastor" has had all these points settled,—for a year, sometimes, and sometimes for life; and I have heard of pastors who, not dying soon enough, were hired by their churches to hold their tongues, and let some one else talk who could better please the people; and of others who, if not allowed to preach, would sue their people at the law, to get the annual stipend "written in the bond." Of course few things could be more comforting to many young men, coming out of college with weak backs, flabby muscles, dyspeptic stomachs, overworked brains, throats enveloped and enfeebled by white cravats, and also slightly infected by a disease called laziness; persons supported at home by their parents, in college by charity, and in the seminary by some fund,—than to become convinced of the fact that they were called of God to leave the world at large to go to perdition the shortest way, while they were specially selected to be pastors of some rich, proud, and fashionable church, in which, when once settled, having the call of God confirmed and made an "effectual calling" by the force of a few thousand dollars a year, they could with their bedecked and jewelled families sit down, and most earnestly "consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet . . . . Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." To be sure, it may require considerable skill in balancing, to keep in the easy seat, to gratify the rich, to entertain the learned, to satisfy the poor, and to keep everything straight; but then, if one fails, why, the world is wide, and another vacancy and another call may supply his needs and keep him still in the "pastoral office." Such is the pastor in the estimation of many, and the young minister who fails to get a job of this kind, or to receive such a call, sometimes wanders about, idle and disconsolate, seeking rest and finding none.

But what is the scriptural idea of the matter? Let us examine the passage in question briefly. When speaking of the ascension of Jesus, Paul remarks that "He gave (or appointed) some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers."—Eph. 4: 11. I do not propose lengthily to investigate the claims and conditions of each of these classes. In passing, however, I may remark a word concerning them.

I. The Apostles. An apostle (apostolos) signifies simply one sent forth, or sent off; a messenger, an ambassador, envoy, and sometimes the commander of an expedition, &c. It comes from the Greek apostello or "sent forth," which is often used in the New Testament. Apostolos is rendered messenger (Phil. 2: 25), and applied to Epaphroditus. It is also rendered messengers, and applied to "the brethren" sent with Titus in 2 Cor. 8: 23. In John 13: 16, it is translated "he that is sent," who is not greater than him that sent him. In the seventy-eight other instances where it is found in the New Testament, it is not translated, but transferred—apostles. An apostle, then, is one sent. He may be sent by the Phillipians, or by the churches, if so be he is their messenger, or apostle, or he may have been sent by Christ, and if so, he is, like the twelve, the apostle or messenger of Jesus Christ. Whether there have been any other apostles since the first preaching of Christ I do not undertake to decide. When Paul's apostleship was questioned, he could say: "Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen the Lord?" Whether other professed apostles could abide this test, or prove that they had been personally sent by the Lord, may be doubted until demonstrated. Evangelists, and all christian laborers, may have been sent by the Holy Spirit, by the personal mandate of Christ.

This seems to have been the case with apostles in ancient time. Yet if they can work "the signs of an apostle" "in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds" (2 Cor. 12: 12), then their case will seem more clear: but if "the signs of an apostle" in these instances are only the saying over of forms, or the performing of ceremonies, the matter will seem more doubtful; while, if the tokens of their apostleship consist mainly in leading captive weak women, in making misguided men sell that they have, not that they may give alms, but that they may have the money to dispose of in some "common interest" operation; or in getting the money that used to be laid at the apostles' feet now put into their pockets,—and instead of choosing out seven men full of faith and the Holy Ghost to set over these matters, putting themselves over them to manage the concern; then, if these be the only tokens of their apostleship, it may be doubted—not, whether there are apostles, for Mormons, Irvingites, or Christian churches may send their "messengers," or apostles—but whether such persons are truly the apostles of Jesus Christ, as were those whom he sent in days of old.

"But God hath set some in the church; first, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that, miracles; then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." 1. Cor. 12: 28. And if God has set them in the church, they ought to be in the church now, and in it always." Truly spoken; but what do you mean by "in the church"? Do you mean by it in your little narrow, contemptible, bigoted society or sect? If so let me say I do not think it is big enough to hold one apostle, much less a dozen. Possibly if Paul was in it now, i. e. in your church, you would very soon turn him out. But the apostles are in the church. The church is one body. Successive generations do not make successive churches, nor do they mar the unity of the "one body," and the one building. Paul is in the church to-day, sleeping in Jesus though he be; "being dead, yet speaketh." God hath set the apostles "in the church"; but where? We set great stones in a building, but where? In the roof, in the sides, all along up and down? No; but in the foundation! There is just where God set the apostles FIRST; not second, third, or fourth; but he hath "set some in the church; FIRST, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers;" and in this divine arrangement, the church is "built upon the foundation of the APOSTLES and prophets; Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone." Eph. 2: 20. There is where God put the apostles "in the church." Let them stay there then; or at least if others come let each of them show "the signs of an apostle," "with all patience," before we be required to believe.

II. As prophets are put into the foundation with the apostles, so in the passage under consideration, as he appointed some persons to be apostles, so he appointed some to be prophets. The Greek word propheeteɛs, or prophet, signified an interpreter of the gods, one who declared oracles in the name of a god, or expounded what the god had spoken. The Hebrew word nah vee signified one who, impelled by a divine influence, or by the divine spirit, rebuked kings and nations, or foretold future events. When Moses was sent to Pharaoh, "The Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh; and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet." Exod. 7: 1. That is, you shall suggest and teach what shall be said, and Aaron shall declare it to Pharaoh as your spokesman. The work of the prophet, then, was declarative. God revealed himself to him, and he told others what he learned of God, whether referring to events past, present or future. Hence Abraham was called a prophet. Gen. 20: 7; also the patriarchs, Ps 105: 15, "Do my prophets no harm." As the prophet's work was to declare God's will, persons might be prophets without receiving direct communications from God, provided they declared what he had really spoken, even though it was revealed to others. Hence Miriam is called a prophetess, (Exod. 15: 20); though she had do direct communications from God like Moses. See Num. 12: 1–6. So persons were educated for the work of teaching under the guidance of other prophets, as the young men at Gilgal called "the sons of the prophets" under Elisha, while the direct inspiration of God sometimes came upon men who were neither prophets, nor sons of prophets, as upon Amos, who was an herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit. The prophetic inspiration was occasional rather than constant. Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are. The seventy elders with Eldad and Medad once prophesied in the camp of Israel; on one occasion Saul was found among the prophets; and Baalam prophesied of blessing when he would have cursed Israel. Sometimes also prophets departed from the Lord, and were punished for their sins. See 1 Kings 13: 11–29.

In the New Testament also, the same breadth of application of the term prophet may be observed. Some there were who prophesied like Agabus, and foretold future events; while others prophesied by declaring anew the truths already revealed. This prophesying was not by any means the business of an exclusive caste or set of men, a clergy, as our moderns term them, who might prophesy, as distinguished from a laity who might not; for in the last days when the Spirit was to be poured upon "all flesh," both servants and handmaidens were to prophesy, while young men were to see visions and old men were to dream dreams. Hence Philip had four virgin daughters which did prophesy, and even before Christ came Anna was a prophetess in Israel. But the ordinary prophesying in the church was the privilege of all. "For ye may all prophesy, one by one." "Covet earnestly the best gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy." "He that prophesieth edifieth the church." "Greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues." "He that prophesieth speaketh to edification, to exhortation, and comfort." "If all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all." See 1 Cor. 14: 24. Women were to pray or prophesy with their heads covered; men with their heads uncovered. 1 Cor. 11: 4, 5. Every man woman or child, who could speak to edification, exhortation and comfort, it seems might at proper times be allowed to prophesy. Wherever the Spirit of God prompted to this work, there was liberty to do it in order and in decency; and by its power many were convinced of sin, and would worship and adore the Lord. Of course some might prophesy more intelligently or acceptably than others, and so they might be termed especially prophets; particularly if to them God granted sometimes direct revelations of his will. Here then we find apostles and prophets set, or appointed in the church, as an integral portion of the same.

III. He appointed some to be evangelists. An evangelist is simply a bringer of good tidings, or a Gospel preacher; Gospel being only good news. The Gospel is termed evangelion, the preaching of it is evangelizo to evangelize, and the man who did it was called an evangelistes or evangelist. "We declare to you glad tidings," or we evangelize to you. Acts 13: 32, &c., &c. Philip was called an evangelist (Acts 21: 8), and Timothy was bidden to "do the work of an evangelist."—2 Tim. 4: 5. The word only is found in these places, and in Eph. 4: 11. Paul is not called an evangelist, but he was such most assuredly. Every man who preaches the gospel is an evangelist—he proclaims the evangel, the good news, he evangelizes, and he is an evangelist just so far as he does it. Whether he preach in courts or halls, in palaces or hovels, in temples or in caves, he evangelizes, and is an evangelist. Whether he preach in one place, ten places, or an hundred places; whether he preach there one year, ten years or fifty years; so that he preach the pure Gospel of God to the perishing sons of men,—he does "the work of an evangelist." The idea that only itinerants, travelers, persons having no certain dwelling places, are evangelists, is a great mistake. They may do the work of evangelists more fully, than idler men, but all who preach Christ's good news are properly called evangelists.

IV. Pastors and Teachers. I join the two together, because Paul does. He does not say some to be pastors, and some to be teachers,—but some to be "pastors and teachers." And in 1 Cor. 12: 28, after Apostles and Prophets, he omits all mention of evangelists and pastors, showing that he did not consider them necessarily separate, and says: "thirdly, TEACHERS." The pastor's work, then, is nearly related to the work of teaching: pastors and teachers were, it would seem, usually, if not always, identical or nearly so. A pastor should be a teacher, though a teacher may not be a pastor. The term pastors occurs no where else in the New Testament; but this passage is frequently quoted, by almost every man who seems disinclined to do the more active service in the Lord's field, thus: "Well, the Lord has set pastors in the church. A pastor is a man settled to preach to some church where they will pay him for it; and I think my calling is to be a pastor, and I shall stay in it as long as any one will keep me, and be a pastor, for God has set pastors in the church." If this position were correct they would by it exclude all evangelists, or preachers of the Gospel from their churches; and take upon themselves the offices of prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers and all. For their idea is, God has set a diversity of gifts in the church; for example, sleek, comfortable looking pastors where churches are rich and can pay them pretty well, and gaunt, hungry looking evangelists, for fields where money is scarce and labor severe, and they! they feel specially called to be pastors! But Christ has set all these things in the church; and no church can, without a most injurious departure from the mind of Christ, diverge from the divine arrangement, and put one gift, be it that of pastor or any other one, in the place of the many which God has given to the church.

What, then, is a [illegible]? Is he a salaried officer of the [illegible] stantly to a single [illegible] sole care of a single [illegible] church, [illegible] of him [illegible]

The Greek word poimeen, rendered pastor, occurs eighteen times in the New Testament. It is a very simple word, and has a very obvious meaning. Seventeen times our translators have translated it uniformly from Greek into English; and once they have translated it from Greek into Latin! The Greek word poimeen signifies a flock or herd of cattle, especially of sheep. Hence came the word poimeen a shepherd, or herdsman. This is its sole and simple meaning. Hence also came poimaino, to feed, tend, guide, or rule a flock—doing a shepherd's duty to them. Now this word poimeen, or shepherd, occurring eighteen times in the New Testament, is translated by the English word shepherd, SEVENTEEN TIMES, and by the Latin word pastor in this single instance. It is rendered shepherd by Wicklif, Tyndale, and Cranmer, but King James' translators, instead of putting in the proper English translation of the word, as they did in the other seventeen instances, thought it best to insert it here in Latin, "pastor," a word having the same meaning, but needing to be translated into English for English readers. Why was this? Was it for the same reason that they used other words such as "bishoprick," "Easter," "Babtizo," &c., so that the common people, not understanding them, would be forced to come to them for light, and so they could explain the words to fit the customs of the church, rather than to modify the church rites to correspond to the meaning of the words?

For the Crisis.

Paradoxical.

We want a faith that brings to view
Those things that are unseen,
That reaches for a world to come,
And lifts the veil between.

We would "endure" the woes of earth,
And every sorrow bear,
"As seeing Him invisible,"
And on Him cast our care.

"As poor, yet making many rich,"
"As sorrowful, yet" still
"Always rejoicing" in the Lord,
And in his holy will.

"As having nothing, yet" through grace
"Possessing" all we need,
Heirs to a rich inheritance,
Yea, to "all things" indeed.

The Sixth Seal.

BY S. S. BREWER.

"And I beheld when he had OPENED the SIXTH SEAL, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood."—REV. 6: 12.

The above portion of holy scripture is of a very interesting character, and the events declared by the Almighty to transpire both at their opening and during their consecutive fulfillment, are of so marked a nature, that it seems impossible for any one to doubt when so complete a history of their accomplishment can be obtained. The opening of this seal was to be marked by a "great earthquake," and closed by the consummation of the conflict of ages, in bringing "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman," to hide "themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains," and to say unto the "mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; FOR THE GREAT DAY OF HIS WRATH IS COME, and who shall be able to stand?" It does seem positive to my mind, that every living being on earth is present at this grand, solemn, and final scene. "Hide us from the wrath of the Lamb," is the despairing exclamation that falls from the lips of all out of Christ. "Hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the THRONE." This is doubtless a parallel to Matt. 25: 31, 32,—"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." The disposition of the two classes is very definitely marked. 46th verse,—"And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal." The Apostle Paul to the church at Thessalonica presents the same idea in his 2 Epistle 1: 7, 8;—"When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints." Thus we see, by a comparison of the plain teaching of our Lord in Matt. 25, and the Apostle's letter, that [illegible] "the saints" and "them that know not God" [illegible] children of the wicked one." To which class, dear reader, do you now belong? O! for your own present, future and eternal well being, see to it instantly. Mark well—but two classes, when the Son of man sits upon the throne of his glory: one class go away into everlasting punishment, the other into life eternal.

If this seal under which we are now living brings us to the great day of his wrath, we should most certainly with becoming interest and godly sincerity be led to inquire into the subject, by a careful examination of God's word, and a comparison of such facts as history may furnish as corresponding. The first event as noted by the Revelator, and that which is to distinguish the OPENING OF THE SIXTH SEAL, is,

First. "A GREAT EARTHQUAKE." The Savior in the twenty-fourth of Matthew declared there should be earthquakes in divers places before his coming to judge the world; but at the opening of this seal there was to be a great earthquake. History furnishes this fact. The first extract is from Blackwood's Magazine of July 9th, 1844.

"On the morning of All-Saints day, the 1st of Nov., 1775, Lisbon was almost torn up from the foundations by the most terrible earthquake on European record. As it was a high Romish festival, the population were crowding to the churches, which were lighted up in honor of the day. About a quarter before ten the first shock was felt, which lasted the extraordinary length of six or seven minutes, then followed an interval of about five minutes. The concussions were so violent in both instances that nearly all the solid buildings were dashed to the ground, and the principal part of the city almost wholly ruined. The terror of the population, rushing through the streets, gathered in the churches, or madly attempting to escape into the fields, may be imagined; but the whole scene of horror, death, and ruin, exceeds all description. The ground split into chasms, into which the people were plunged in their flight. Crowds fled to the water, but the Tagus, agitated like the land, suddenly rose to an astonishing height, burst upon the land, and swept away all within its reach. It was said to have risen to the height of five and twenty or thirty feet above its usual level, and to have sunk again as much below it. And this phenomenon occurred four times."

The second is taken from the Cyclopedia of History, p. 639, printed and published by Case, Tiffany and Burnham, 1845, Hartford, Ct.

"Nov. 1st, 1755, Lisbon was destroyed by the most terrible earthquake that has ever occurred: 60,000 persons perished in six minutes. The sea first retired, then rolled in, rising fifty feet above its usual bed. The largest mountain in Portugal rocked and split asunder, and sent forth flames and clouds of dust. The shock was felt nearly all over Europe, in the north part of Africa, in the Atlantic, and even in the West Indies; a vast wave swept over the coast of Spain, and in some places sixty feet in height. Near Morocco the earth swallowed up about 10,000 persons, with their herds, and then closed over them."

Thus in a most positive manner has God marked the sixth seal. The above extracts seem to correspond precisely with the prediction. We will proceed to notice briefly the next event in order as seen in vision by the Revelator.

Second. "And the sun became black as sackcloth of hair." Among the great number of historical testimonies concerning the dark day of May 19th, 1780, I shall present but one, which is so emphatic, and so much to the point, that this must suffice:

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived; 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man, for his lamp was trimmed and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude. His nephew, who was then a little child, in after life retained a lively recollection of that scene, and in his childish feelings are an interesting exhibition of the manner in which Mr. Lee was regarded, for he felt not the least alarm in his presence, thinking that he was perfectly safe where his good uncle was, even if the day of judgment had come.'"—Tract No. 379 of Amer. Tract Society. Life of Edward Lee, of Mass.

Third. "And the moon became as blood." My extracts on this point shall be very brief. I will quote the following from a letter of Mr. Beadle, of Aleppo, and published in the Missionary Herald of June, 1842, p. 234. It is an account of an earthquake at that place in 1822. He says:—

"On the night of the earthquake there was something peculiar in the atmosphere, the moon appearing as red as blood. This greatly alarmed the inhabitants, who were continually crying out, 'Now we shall hear the trumpet sound! and the dead will rise! the day of judgment has arrived.'"—Litch's Exp. vol. 1, p. 153.

The following was published in the [illegible] [illegible] most remarkable phenomenon [illegible] I ever heard of, except the falling stars. At 3 A. M., the moon, which had been obscured by a cloud for some hours, burst forth of a deep, BLOOD RED COLOR, with a black cross of equal proportions over the face."

For a more particular account of the signs in the moon and stars, see articles No. 13 and 14 of the series on "Evening Shadows."

Dear reader, we now invite your attention to the last sign under this seal, to be witnessed by this generation, previous to the departure of the heavens as a scroll, which inaugurates the great day of God's wrath, which is the Fourth point under consideration. "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind." The fulfillment of this prediction, so wonderful in its nature, and so alarming to those who witnessed it, is described by a writer in the N. Y. Journal of Commerce, of Nov. 15, 1833, from which the following is a very short extract:—

"Neither myself, nor any one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy above quoted. 'It rained fire,' says one; another, 'It was like the large flakes of snow before a coming storm, or large drops of rain before a shower.' I admit their fitness for common accuracy; but they came far short of the accuracy of the figure used by the prophet: 'The stars of heaven fell unto the earth.' They were not sheets, or flakes, or drops of fire; but they were what the world understand by 'falling stars,' and one speaking to his fellow in the midst of the scene would say, 'See how the stars fall!' And he who heard would not pause to correct the astronomy of the speaker, any more than he would be so precise as to reply, 'the sun does not move,' to one who should tell him the sun is rising. The stars fell 'even as the fig tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet."

Extracts from the People's Magazine, Boston, Jan. 1834, on the falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833:—

"The Rockingham, Va., Register calls it, 'A rain of fire,'—thousands of stars being seen at once; some said it began with considerable noise.

The Journal of Commerce informs, that 'three hundred miles this side of Liverpool the phenomenon was as splendid there as here;' and that in 'St. Lawrence Co.' there was a 'snow storm' during the phenomenon, in which the 'falling stars' appeared 'like lightning.' . . . That in 'Germantown, Pa.,' they seemed like 'showers of great hail.'

The Lancaster, Pa., Examiner says, 'The air was filled with innumerable meteors or stars; . . . hundreds of thousands of brilliant bodies might be seen falling at every moment, . . . sloping their descent towards the earth, at an angle of about forty-five degrees, resembling flashes of fire.'"

The next is the great and final scene, as described by the Revelator, which is the passing away of the heavens as a scroll, which, in all probability, will take the world with as much surprise as did either of the preceding events under this seal. The Apostle Peter certifies to this fact, in the following very definite language: "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up." Luke 17: 28. "Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed."

Dearly beloved reader, we are now verging rapidly to the day that God has appointed to judge the world. Each setting sun leaves the days of our probation less. O how solemn is the time in which we are living! The world has no assurance of an hour's safety; and how stands the account with you? May God assist us, in our great weakness, to strive to be found of him in peace.

My dear brethren, preach the coming of Jesus! O ye ministers, preach it, pray it, live it. The work is almost ended; there is every thing testifying throughout creation, "Behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Let your work be done, and well and faithfully done, in the name and by the help of the all-sufficient grace of God. Soon, very soon, the opening heavens will reveal the once injured, but now the all-conquering, [illegible] King of kings and Lord of lords. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." O "come quickly"! Amen and Amen.

Come, Savior, Come.

BY S. A. BREWER.

Tune—"My Willie's on the dark blue sea."

My eyes are lifted up to thee,
O come, my Savior, come,
Thy sacred face I long to see,
And rest with thee at home.

CHORUS.
Then come, Savior, come, we long to see
The sceptre in thy hand,
And take thy waiting ones with thee,
To dwell in Beulah's land.

Thy weeping bride, now saddened, sees
The war King lift his hand,
A shout for blood floats on the breeze,
Distress is in the land.

CHORUS.
We know the kingdom's drawing near,
All things proclaim it nigh,
We watch to see thy sign appear
With glory in the sky.

CHORUS.
We long to see thy saints awake,
A pure and spotless throng;
And the bright morn of glory break
And join the Jubal song.

CHORUS.
There saints and martyrs all shall meet
Upon that peaceful shore,
And friends and kindreds all shall meet
In life forevermore.

CHORUS.

A Glance at our World—No. 1.

Does not our present earth give signs of woe and old age, fickleness and disease? Yes! like a hypochondriac, it has ill turns or paroxisms, when it will rouse the ocean into a tempest, make sport of navies, putting sailors to their wit's end, and strewing the shore with fragments and carcasses of men; at other times, to exhibit some feat of power, will rock a continent or sink an island, and, with a giant strength, shake a massive city into a ruin, utterly burying its wretched inhabitants; soon is sick and writhes and groans as in mortal agony, and finds relief only by disgorging its fiery bowels, burying villages and cities in burning graves. Again, the elements are restive and unsettled and cannot preserve a due medium. They suffocate you with sultry calms, or consolidate their strength into a tornado and sweep the country with the besom of destruction. And the climates of the earth—how ungenial! The extremes—one frigid—the temperate fickle—the tropics oppressive. The oblique position of the earth precludes the possibility of a better climate, and man groans on, hoping for better times in this wicked, sin-cursed earth; but this hope is fallacious. Try it; make yourself master of all science, the politics and laws of all nations; secure the suffrage of a whole country; succeed to the highest pinnacle of power and fame, and receive the homage of the whole world, and what have you but a barren rock, too narrow for friendship, and too slippery for public repose. The envious eyes of the ambitious will be upon you, watching for your halting; the inquisitive meddlings of the fastidious will tease and perplex you, and will make you responsible for almost every local accident and mishap that may occur, and even their own personal failures; and there are those always ready to displease you as soon as they can, and make you with disgrace take the lowest seat. The same liability to disappointment attends other callings and professions. Any success that may be secured cannot be a bar to disappointment, reverse and death. This has been the allotment of past ages, and will be of the future, till the redemption of the body, and the restitution of all things. How few succeed to wealth, fame, power, in any country. The great bulk are doomed to live by the day, to work hard for a precarious living. Their wages are seldom equal to the expense of high rent, fuel, food, clothing, and the doctor's bill.

In countries less privileged, things are proportionately worse. In England, masses of laboring people are glad to work for from one shilling to three a day; and in manufacturing towns there are thousands that make a bare subsistence by observing an economy that is mean and distressing; and at every reverse—changes in the price of cotton or stocks, or some other changes—these thousands are thrown out of employment and become so many miserable paupers. Imagine the mortification, shame and trial of such destitution!—haggard countenances, ragged, neglected, ignorant, and wicked children. Besides this, the swarms of beggars form a considerable portion of the whole population; and so these wretches swell Nature's groans for deliverance.

And what is the hope of these lowly millions? Can the church's millennium help them? No! the very supporters of this fable are their oppressors, who care not for their souls, though under their eyes, but will raise funds to convert the heathen, and would, to gratify their cupidity, use them up in factories, and create for them the very liabilities that disgrace every civilized country under heaven. Step into the homes of these unfortunate people. What a scene is presented! Some stagger as they walk, from exhaustion and hunger,—children crying for bread,—some you may find eating their scanty meal, not knowing from whence the next is to come—perhaps they eat in quiet, or it may be an unquiet meal—mutual criminations go the rounds, and so embitter their poor repast;—others, perhaps, fear God, and are asking for daily bread, and sighing for a better day—a speedy redemption from present sorrow. Says Dr. [illegible], in a letter from Europe, "The English world might be compared to a string of men, each standing on the shoulders of the man below him, and all striving to get higher, but few or none reaching down or helping to lift up others. You will say it is so every where—the world is so. No deep English thinkers believe that the people have not spirit enough for a revolution if it were needed. The abuses of England have become so much a part of her life, that to cut them off would prove fatal, just as an inveterate and large opium taker would die if you stopped his poison. Reforms cannot go on slowly and SURELY at the same time.. The Devil likes slow reforms."

A single glance at our world will convince any one who is open to conviction, that man is not happy; a feeling of uneasiness pervades the world. Go where you please, visit the nation enjoying the most genial climate and fruitful soil, where but little labor is bestowed to secure an ample living; yet we find them the most helpless and degraded of men, idle, violent, unjust, ignorant and impure. Palestine is overrun with pilgrims, idle monks, priests and beggars in general,—and so of Italy, and of the Indies, Africa, with the Turks and native Blacks, some of whom are cannibals. If you go into the latitudes (the same) in America, you will find slavery on the one hand a terrible blight, a curse and scandal to the government that tolerates it; and on the other hand, in South America, the people are crushed under priestly dominion, and degraded by superstition. If you go into the frigid zones of Europe, you will find in general the people reduced to serfdom, but little better than Slavery itself. Here the people are more industrious, but how poorly rewarded for their labor; they may not stipulate the conditions on which to work for their pampered lords. If you go to the extreme North, you may find the people more free and independent; but liberty here is no great privilege, for half their lives is spent in the deep excavation of ice and snow, living, as it were, in the regions of everlasting night and frost.

If you look at our own country, you will find the people the most industrious, virtuous, religious, of any portion of the earth, for the reason they could not exist without hard labor in the beginning, and now they think they cannot, hence where there are the fewest natural advantages in this world, with a good government, the people do the best; yet here things do not always go to please them,—they have trials with their neighbors, their children, their debtors, and their creditors; with the climate, the frosts, the winds, the rain, the drought, the pestilence, the war, and the invasion of Death. Here we are, on every part of this earth, in every clime, under every form of government,—all subject to every kind of fortune; our wants and circumstances diversified as our complexions and features. The lordly aristocrat is no better off than his slave. If the slave groans under the burden of toil, his master does under an indigested meal. If the slave smarts under the lash of the tyrant, the master does under the sharp rebuke of offended, insulted justice. If the slave goes to his cabin wearied with the labors of the day, he can enjoy the luxury of quiet sleep; but the master finds rest in labor,—and if the slave lies down an innocent man, his master has the forebodings of dreadful retribution upon an unquiet bed, haunted by fearful dreams. The Day of Christ "at hand" in the Apostolic Age—in What Sense?

The day of Christ was at hand 1800 years ago. Paul says, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." "The Lord is at hand." Peter says, "The end of all things is at hand." It is said in the Apocalypse, "The time is at hand." According to these passages, the day of Christ was at hand in some sense in the apostolic age. In what sense was it then at hand? It must, as it seems, have been at hand in one of two senses, either absolutely or relatively. It was not absolutely at hand, or it would have come in that age; and the apostle assures the Thessalonian Christians, that it was not at hand in that sense. After affirming the second advent, he said, "Now we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him, that ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand." It is worthy of remark, that the original word here rendered at hand, is not the same as is so rendered in the other passages above quoted; for in this passage, the word rendered "at hand," describes an event as imminent, or just ready to be introduced. He assigns his reasons. He tells them that there was to be "a falling away first," and the revelation of "that man of sin, the son of perdition," who was to have his time according to the sure word of the prophecy, and then be "consumed with the spirit of the Lord's mouth, and be destroyed with the brightness of his coming." Thus we are conducted to the conclusion that the day of the Lord was not absolutely at hand when the apostle wrote.

The end must therefore have been at hand in the other sense, viz., relatively; that is, the time to the end would be short, compared with the period of the world's history then in the past. This principle of exegesis is virtually expressed in the following text: "And that knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep: for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed; the night is far spent, the day is at hand." It will be seen at once that the apostle is speaking relatively: he looks at the amount of the great night of this world then in the past; at the amount of night still in the future; and then, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, deliberately says, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." As though he had said, "We are far from the beginning of the night; we are near its end: the time till the morn of blessedness is short, compared with the long hours of night which are gone." Thus we are furnished with the principle of interpretation, that the day of Christ was at hand relatively in the apostolical age.

If so, where must we be now? Must not the comparatively small balance of "the night" which was then in the future, be about past? and must not the Sun of the eternal day soon, very soon arise? Must not the day of Christ, which was relatively near then, be absolutely so now? In short, is not the end of all things, in the very nature of the case, "nigh at hand?" But let us look at

OTHER PHRASES OF LIKE IMPORT.

There are other forms of expression in the New Testament to which persons generally attach no definite meaning; but which are plain and significant, in the light of the relative principles stated above. Some of them are found in the following class of passages: "A little while and ye shall not see me: and again a little while and ye shall see me." "For yet a little while and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh." "Behold the Judge standeth before the door." "Behold I come quickly." Those who lose sight of the relative principle suggested by the apostle, are forced to the conclusion that the advent referred to in the above passages, is some other event than the personal appearing of Christ, and is far in the past; but in view of this obvious principle of interpretation, we can easily understand the advent intended to be personal and future; though even on this principle it cannot be far distant, but must now be specially nigh.

Take also the following class of texts: "Brethren, the time is short." "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son;" intimating that the last days of the great week of the world's history had begun when our Redeemer was on earth. Peter, speaking of the first advent, says that Christ "was manifest in these last times for you." John, mentioning the developments of anti-christ which were then taking place, says, "whereby we know that it is the last time:" all of which forms of expression convey the idea that the closing period of the world's existence had dawned, and, if so, must now be near its termination.

Another form of expression is worthy of notice. the apostle, speaking of certain things which occurred under the old covenant, says, "They were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come," or as it has been rendered, "upon whom the last of the age is come." But in what sense were "the ends of the world," or "the last of the age," come upon them? May we not suppose it to be in the same sense that one feels that the end of a journey has come upon him when he has traveled more than two-thirds of the entire distance? When Paul penned the above passage, the church had journeyed, according to recent authors of great learning and investigation, nearly 4200 years; and this period, according to the above illustration, had brought her through more than the beginning and middle divisions of her journey: and if so must she not now be almost home? Is not the great wilderness nearly all behind? Is she not on the margin of the heavenly country? It seems that she may now sing with the understanding, as with the spirit:

"On Jordan's stormy banks I stand,
And cast a wishful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie."

We must call attention to another passage before closing. The apostle, in Heb. 9th, says: "Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." According to this, it was "in the end of the world" when the first advent took place. Some may suppose that the Jewish age is intended, but that this is not correct is obvious from the fact that the Jewish age commenced when God took the children of Israel by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, and terminated at the manifestation of the new covenant; whereas the apostle is here speaking of an age which began at the foundation of the world. The context fully verifies this statement. The previous verse reads, speaking of Christ, "Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year with the blood of others; for then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world." The reader will notice that the starting point in the apostle's mind is the "foundation of the world." Then come the words under consideration, "but now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself;" obviously meaning that in the close of the world or age, reckoning from the creation, our Saviour's first advent occurred. He then adds: "And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation;" as he had said, instead of the Savior suffering annually, which would have occasioned his suffering very often from the beginning of the world, he delayed his coming till the end of time was approaching, when he came in humility, and offered himself as an atonement for sin, on the altar of the cross, and then, as it were, took the blood of his sacrifice and went within the veil to plead during the comparatively short interval which should intervene between his sufferings, and the actual end of the age, when he will make his second advent, without a sin-offering, and bless his waiting people with full salvation.

In conclusion we may safely remark:

1. The expressions, "the day at hand," "the end of all things is at hand," and similar ones, were not uttered at random, but on some definite principle.

2. The only principle suggested in the apostolical writings, is the relative principle, viz., that the time to the end of the age was short compared with the amount of time then in the past.

3. If this principle be well founded, then there cannot be a 1000 years of universal righteousness and peace before the end; but we must be occupying the closing hours of grace, and

"Not many years their round shall run,
Not many mornings rise,
Ere all the glory stands revealed
To our admiring eyes."

What is Life?

Is it life! in sport to pass away
The hours of each succeeding day,
To quaff rich nectar from the cup,
Or of mingled wines often to sup,
To mix with the gay and merry crowd,
And hear the voice of laughter loud;
To see the toasts anon pass round,
And hear their echo's empty sound?
Is it life, in gaudy dress attired,
To be by all around admired,
To hear the fleeting breeze of fame
Follow awhile and gild our name,
To wear the diadems of earth,
And know naught else but ease and mirth;
To be the child of pomp and pride,
And fashion's votary beside?
O, no! there is no life in all
The noisy mirth or festive ball,
Each, evanescent as a dream,
Are borne along Time's rapid stream;
They quickly pass and ne'er return,
But sink into the silent urn
Of cold oblivion, where they wait
Their sure and lasting bitter fate.
O! then, if none or all of these,
The gentle morn or evening breeze,
Cannot to beings here below
Afford a joy unmix'd with woe,—
Then tell the source of lasting joy,
Of bliss, true bliss, without alloy!
The source of life is hid with God,
Made known through Jesus' precious blood,
Applied to cleanse the guilt of sin,
And form the heart anew within.
And then 'tis life to feel the while,
The Savior's fond, approving smile
Resting upon the broken heart,
Which joy and perfect bliss impart.
'Tis always life to walk with God,
And though we feel the chast'ning rod,
'Tis mercy that inflicts the blow,
That we may more of glory know;
'Tis only to refine the gold,
And purify in heaven's mould
The heart from all remaining dross,
And sanctifying every cross,
Our glorious change will quickly come,
And waft us to our blissful home.
Then let us wait, and pray, and fear,
Till Christ shall dry the last sad tear.

Selections.

Will you Enlist?

(Concluded.)

"You're rather hard there, comrade; but, now that your paper is finished, let me tell you that when I enlisted to serve my country I received clothing and arms, so that I am bound to serve truly, to fight my country's battles, and to shed my blood for the honor of the Union."

"And have you received nothing from the King of kings?"

"Not a thing."

"No? Why, who gave you your life, and all your faculties? Who made the sun and moon that light you by day and night? the beasts and the produce of the fields that supply you with food and raiment? Who gave his own Son, our Savior Jesus Christ, to die on the cross for sinners? Who bestowed on us that blessed book the Bible? and who has prepared a world of glory for every one that fights under his banner, and continues to be his faithful soldier till his life's end? Instead of not receiving any thing at his hands, you have received from him all you possess."

"You look so earnest at me, and speak in such a way, that I feel half afraid of you. To make me out a deserter, a rebel, and a traitor, is going too far. I don't see that I am worse than other folks, though I may not be any better. You make me out black indeed."

"Nay, comrade, I have only read the hand-bill to you, and if there is any thing there that touches you, I can only say the substance of it is from the Word of God. Now, supposing that you should get wounded—what will become of you?"

"Become of me? Why, I shall be taken care of, and have a pension, to be sure. Did you never hear of the Military Hospital? Old soldiers live there as happy as lords. Our government has taken care of that."

"And if you should live there as happy as a lord, you must die there at last; and what will become of you then? Has that been taken care of too?"

"How you talk! That's my lookout."

"I am glad you think so; and now tell me, comrade, what sort of a lookout you have."

"Why, that's a poser; but I reckon it will be with many of us as it is now; our rations will be much the same; I shall share as well as my comrades. It's a thing that I don't much care to think of. We must all die when our time comes—that's certain."

"The Bible says as much; but dying is not all: 'It is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment.'"

"That is what Harry Towers tells us; but, as I said, I keep away from him."

"You may keep away from Harry Towers, but you can't keep away from the judgment-seat of Christ, comrade."

"You're right enough there. How do you manage that?"

"By fleeing for refuge to the stronghold; by acknowledging my sins, and seeking pardon through the death and intercession of the Captain of my salvation. The gospel of Christ is worth more than a thousand hospitals."

"But what is this gospel that you say so much about?"

"What is it? why, it would take the tongue of an angel, ay, an archangel, to tell you what it is. You must not expect that such a poor unlettered sinner as I am can tell you a hundredth part of what it is. However, as you ask me the question, I will not be quite silent about the matter. The gospel is the news of God's grace; it is tidings of great joy; it is medicine to the sick, a cordial to the faint, wine and oil to the wounded, food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, clothing to the naked, riches to the poor, a friend to the friendless, a home to the homeless; it is——"

"Halt! Why, your tongue runs as glibly as our corporal's when he reads the roll. I asked you but one question, and you have given me a dozen answers already."

"Well, hear me out: The gospel is a remedy for sin, a cure for sorrow, a life-purifier, a death-composer, a hope to the hopeless, a joy to the wretched, a remover of all things that stand between us and God, and a heaven to those who looked for nothing but weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

"A pretty good list, take it altogether; but a man must be a saint before he deserves these things."

"They are not deserved by a saint; but God, in his mercy, has promised them all to a repentant sinner. If you are once taught that you are a perishing sinner, and cry for mercy to the Father of mercies, you will not cry in vain. 'Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' Come, comrade, will you be a christian soldier? Will you enlist?"

"You're a queer man. I little thought what you were when I asked you to enlist as a soldier. If you'll give me that hand-bill, I'll try to spell it over at another time."

"Do, comrade, do, but one word before we part, for I must turn off here. Don't make a light matter of your eternal salvation. 'The Lord is nigh unto all that call upon him; to all that call upon him in truth. He will fulfill the desire of them that fear him; he also will hear their cry and will save them.' REMEMBER, THE GREAT REVIEW DAY IS AT HAND, WHEN THE JUDGE OF HEAVEN AND EARTH SHALL REND THE HEAVENS, AND COME DOWN IN MIGHT, MAJESTY, AND DOMINION, TO JUDGE THE ASSEMBLED WORLD STANDING BEFORE HIS THRONE. Then it will be seen whether we are true men or deserters and rebels. No question will be asked about uniform, but, Have we been faithful soldiers of Christ, ready to live and die in his service, willing to share his cross, and desiring to wear his crown?"

"Well, comrade, farewell. I'll be as good as my word, and spell over the hand-bill."

"Farewell; may the words be sent home to your heart, so that we may be soldiers of the same corps, and obey the same Captain."

"That's a good fellow, I'll be bound for it, and wishes well to a soldier. The truth's the truth, all the world over; and I do think that many of us are a heathenish, ungodly set of folks, and so I said. I'll spell the hand-bill over again; it may do me good. One thing I see now that I never saw before—that a man may be well armed who carries neither a musket nor bayonet, and that he may be a good soldier without being in uniform."

BORN 1602, DIED 1669.

1. Truth is the daughter of time; it will not always lie hid.

2. Crosses come thick; be patient!

3. Let us labor to be like unto angels, "strengthened with all might," walking about the world as conquerors, able to do all things through Christ who strengtheneth us.

4. Let no man envy others their better parts or places, since they have them on no other condition but to be put upon greater temptations, hotter services. If we could wish another man's honor, when we feel the weight of his cares, as David once did of Saul's armor, we should be glad to be in our own coat.

5. We know not what we lose by making haste, and not holding up our hands as Moses did, to the going down of the sun. If God have begun to enlarge us, he will in due time do it to the full, if we should not be in straits sometimes.

6. David saw the features of his friend Jonathan in lame Mephibosheth, and therefore loved him. He forgave Nabal at Abagail's intercession, and was pacified toward Absalom at Joab's. Pharaoh favored Jacob's house for Joseph's sake; shall not God do as much more for Jesus's sake? Joseph was well pleased with his brethren when they brought Benjamin. Bring but the child Jesus in our arms, as Simeon did, and he cannot but smile upon us. Were he never so much displeased before, yet, upon the sight of this his well-beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased, all shall be calm and quiet as the sea when once Jonah was cast into it.

7. Endure hardness. Never dream of a delicacy. Think not to find God in the garden of Egypt, whom Moses found not but in the burning bush. Many love Canaan, but loathe the wilderness; commend this country, but look upon the conquest as impossible; would sit in the seat of honor with Zebedee's children, but not drink the cup of affliction.

8. No wearing the crown, but by bearing the cross first. Christ himself was not glorified, till first crucified.

9. "And He will thoroughly purge his floor." That is, his church, called God's threshing-floor in Isaiah, because usually threshed by God with the flail of affliction. That is the way by which, or whereby, the Lord Christ doth purge his people, and separate between the son whom he loves and the sin which he hates. We may observe in this the difference between Christ and the tempter. Christ hath his fan in his hand, and he fanneth us; the Devil has a sieve in his hand, and he sifteth us. Now, a fan casteth out the worst, and keepeth in the best; a sieve keepeth in the worst, and casteth out the best. So Christ and his trials purgeth chaff and corruption out of us, and nourisheth and increases his graces in us. Contrawise, the Devil, what evil soever is in us, he confirmeth it; what faith or good thing soever, he weakeneth it.

Everlasting Punishment.

The different views concerning the future state held by the Christian Church may be thus classified, arranging them, exhaustively, under eight divisions:

I. The Roman Catholic Church makes three conditions hereafter, namely:
1. Everlasting joy.
2. Everlasting suffering.
3. Temporary sorrow in purgatory.

II. The orthodox Protestant Church makes two conditions hereafter, namely:
1. Infinite and eternal joy.
2. Infinite and eternal suffering.

III. The old-school Universalists make one condition hereafter, namely:
1. Eternal joy.

IV. New-school Universalists and Restorationists make two conditions hereafter, namely:
1. Eternal joy.
2. Temporary and finite suffering.

V. Unitarians make an indefinite number of conditions hereafter, according to the various characters and moral status of men.

VI. The Swedenborgians make an indefinite but limited number of heavens and hells, suited to the varieties of character, but having a super-natural origin.

VII. The Spiritualists make the other world like this world, with no essential differences, making it a continuation of the natural life.

VIII. The Annihilationists believe that the finally impenitent will perish wholly, and come to nothing.—Christian Intelligencer.

A SHORT SERMON.—Keep out of debt. Avoid it as you would war, pestilence and famine. Hate it with a perfect hatred. Abhor it with an entire abhorrence. Dig potatoes, break stones, peddle tin-ware. Do anything that is honest and useful, rather than run into debt. As you value good digestion, a healthy appetite, a placid temper, a smooth pillow, pleasant dreams, and happy wakenings, keep out of debt. Debt is the hardest of all taskmasters, the most cruel of all oppressors. It is a millstone about the neck. It is an incubus on the heart. It spreads a cloud over the firmament of man's being. It furrows the forehead with premature wrinkles; it plucks from the eye its light; it drags all nobleness and kindness out of the port and bearing of man. It takes all the soul out of his laugh, and all stateliness out of his walk. Come not under its accursed dominion, nor ever be its slave. Owe no man anything.

☞ Words are nice things, but they strike hard. We wield them so easily that we are apt to forget their hidden power. Fitly spoken, they fall like the sunshine, the dew, and the summer rain—but when unfitly, like the frost, the hail, and the desolating tempest.

"This is for your health."—PAUL.

Precautions.

1. Never sleep in a room where there is any green paper on the walls, as this color is made of arsenic or lead; the former is by far the most dangerous, being scheeles green, and is known positively by a drop of muriatic acid on the green leaving it white.

2. White glazed visiting-cards contain sugar of lead, and will poison a child who is tempted to chew them from the slight sweetish taste.

3. Green glazed cards used for concert-tickets, are still more poisonous; a single one of them contains a grain and a half of arsenic, enough to kill a child.

4. Never put a pin in the mouth or between the teeth, for a single instant, because a sudden effort to laugh or speak, may convey it into the throat, or lungs, or stomach, causing death in a few minutes, or requiring the windpipe to be cut open to get it out; if it has passed into the stomach, it may, as it has done, cause years of suffering, ceasing only when it has made its way out of the body through the walls of the abdomen or other portion of the system.

5. It is best to have no button or string about any garment worn during the night. A long, loose night-gown is the best thing to sleep in. Many a man has facilitated an attack of apoplexy by buttoning his shirt-collar.

6. If you wake up of a cold night, and find yourself very restless, get out of bed, and standing on a piece of carpet or cloth of any kind, spend five or ten minutes in rubbing the whole body vigorously and rapidly with the hands, having previously thrown the bed clothing towards the foot of the bed so as to air both bed and body.

If you find that you have inadvertently eaten too much, instead of taking something to settle the stomach, thus adding to the load under which it already labors, take a continuous walk with just enough activity to keep up a very slight moisture or perspiration on the skin, and do not stop until entirely relieved, but end your exercise in a warm room, so as to cool off very slowly.

8. Never put on a pair of new boots or shoes on a journey, especially on a visit to the city; rather wear your easiest, oldest pair, otherwise you will soon be painfully disabled.

9. A loosely-fitting boot or shoe, while traveling in winter, will keep the feet warmer without any stockings at all, than a light pair, over the thickest, warmest hose.

10. Riding against a cold wind, immediately after singing or speaking in public, is suicide.

11. Many public speakers have been disabled for life by speaking under a hoarseness of voice.

12. If you happen to get wet in cold weather, keep moving on foot with a rapidity sufficient to keep off a feeling of chilliness until you get into a house, and not waiting to undress, drink instantly and plentifully of hot tea of some sort; then undress, wipe dry quickly, and put on warm, dry clothing.

13. Never go to bed with cold feet, if you want to sleep well.

14. If a person faints, place him instantly flat on a bed, or floor, or earth, on his back, and quietly let him alone at least for ten minutes; if it is simply a fainting-fit, the blood, flowing on a level, will more speedily equalize itself throughout the system; cold water dashed in the face, or a sitting position are unnecessary and pernicious.

15. Never blow your nose, nor spit the product of a cough, nor throw a fruit-peel on the sidewalk.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Digestion and Repose of Mind.

There is one more element which plays a most important part in digestion, and that is the state of the nervous system. More often than men think, the seat of their digestive difficulties lies neither on their tables nor in their stomachs, but in their brain. Worry, agitation, oppression with care, restlessness of aim, a monotonous or despondent life, all these express themselves in capricious appetites and undigested food. Very often, too, a remedy for these evils is vainly sought in change or restriction of a diet by no means particularly faulty. The influence of the mental state upon the disposal of the food has been demonstrated in the case of prisoners. The depression attending the prison-life, has made absolutely indispensable a compensation, in the form of a more liberal diet, for those whose sentence extends over any considerable period; and thus has risen the comparative good feeding of the criminal, as compared with other classes of the community, which has sometimes excited so much comment. In his heavy mental atmosphere, the prisoner languishes upon a diet which might suffice a hope and home-cheered man with the same amount of work.

How to Preserve the Teeth.

The mouth is a very warm place—98 degrees Fahrenheit. In this northern climate we have a temperature so high in the shade, even at ninety, beef will begin to decompose in twenty-four hours. The particles of beef and other food which are left between the teeth begin to putrefy before dinner the next day. If you then pick the teeth the odor of the breath tends to decomposition. With this management we ought not to be surprised that the gums and teeth should become the subjects of disease. What is to be done?

Use the tooth-pick (goose-quill) after each meal. Follow with a mouthful or two of water, to remove the particles the tooth-pick may have left behind.

With these simple things thoroughly done you will preserve the teeth to old age.

THE CANCER.—In answer to the inquiry in the Crisis a few weeks since, as to what would cure a Cancer, I would offer the following, and ask the Crisis to copy:—

"Take ripe Polk-berries; squeeze the juice out on a pewter plate, (if that is not at hand, take a new tin plate,) and place it in the heat of the sun or under a stove, and stir with a stick of brimstone till it becomes a salve."

There is a woman here, of my acquaintance, an Advent Sr. (Mrs. Barnes) who had the worst form of cancer in the breast. I thought she could not live but a short time; but from the use of this salve she is getting well. No one need fear to use it. Spread the salve on cloth and lay on the cancer. ALEX. MCCLURE.

LOW-NECKED DRESSES.—Bishop Timon, of Western New York, has issued a letter addressed "to the honored and pious christian women of the diocese" upon a subject which he has long refrained to touch, though pressed apparently by divine impulse,—low-necked dresses. He discoursed at much length on the modesty of dress, quoting largely from the Scriptures on the score of morality, and from the writings of Catherine Beecher, Dr. Ellis and others, as respects health. The Bishop trusts that christian ladies will receive his advice in the spirit in which it is given, and directs that the pastors under his charge touch upon the subject in their discourses.

☞ THE CRISIS is devoted to the exposition of all Bible truth; especially, the doctrine of the immediate, personal coming and reign of Christ on the earth; holiness of heart; the unconscious state of the dead; their literal resurrection, and the final destruction of the wicked.

For the Crisis.

Be not Afraid.

Art toiling on life's changing sea,
Deep waters dark encircling thee,
The storm-king bold 'gainst thee arrayed?
Then listen while you faithful pray,
And hear your Savior sweetly say,—
"I'm with thee still, be not afraid!"

Art by temptation rudely tossed,
Near dashing 'gainst the rock-bound coast,
Thy 'wildered heart by fear dismayed?
Grasp closer still your Father's hand,
He'll steer your bark from off the strand,
And guide you home—be not afraid.

Art sinking 'neath affliction's wave?
Art drifting near the yawning grave,
Where cold and still the dead are laid?
Believe in Christ, who says, "I'll come
And raise your body from the tomb"—
Trust ye in God, be not afraid!

Along the voyage of life, each day
New clouds hang threat'ning o'er our way,
Our hopes like shadows fade,—
Unless we meekly trust in God,
And look beyond the chast'ning rod,
To Him who said, "be not afraid!"

The Pastoral Work, and the Various Gifts in the Church.

BY H. L. HASTINGS.

In these days of corruption and degeneracy, while almost everything pertaining to the gospel of Christ is perverted, few things lie in the minds of the common people and the church more entirely contrary to the teachings of the New Testament, than the common theory of the pastoral office. There is but one place in our version of the New Testament, where the word pastors occurs, (and it being a Latin word, it has a very poor right to be even there,) and yet upon this simple, single untranslated word, rests a vast system of pastorship as different from the gospel as the philosophy of Plato is from the preaching of Paul. But, says one, "Does not Paul tell us of apostles, prophets and evangelists, and pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints?" Certainly he does; but that he meant by them what you mean when you use the same words, remains to be seen. You mean by an "evangelist" a man who, having no settled preaching place, runs up and down in the world where God sends him, and the people need him; preaches the word of God, takes for it what men give him, and lives on that if he can, and if not, earns more; endures privation, wears his old clothes till patched, perhaps, and ragged; wears himself out in the Master's cause; goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed; faces scorn and contempt, storm and tempest; sings gladness to many a tearful pilgrim's heart,—cannot be bought or hired to leave his work, and finally dies on the field with his harness on. This man is an evangelist in your opinion. And so no doubt he is, and as such will receive divine blessing and reward at the appearing of Christ.

But how about a pastor? Well, a pastor, a "settled pastor," as the phrase runs in common talk,—for we never read of a "settled pastor" in all the Bible,—a settled pastor is one who, from being wearied with preaching all over the land, or from a natural aversion to trying the rough usage incident to that sort of labor, or from feeble health, or from a desire for steady pay, or more of it, or from a sincere and special love for the souls within a certain town, parish, or village, has, in some way, either by his preaching, or his politeness, or his learning, or his reputation, or his general excellence of character, convinced the majority, or the rich portion of some local church, that it would be a fine thing for them to have such a man as he is live in their neighborhood, talk to them two or three times a week, visit in their houses, take tea with their families, attend the sewing societies, the prayer meetings, the church fairs and the levees, the weddings, the funerals, &c., and finally, to be their pastor. Moreover they have found that he will come and live comfortably with them, as becomes a disciple of Him who had not where to lay his head; preach to them of the dangers of loving money, getting sleepy, careless and worldly, and try by all lawful means to save them from hell for the sum of five, ten, twenty, fifty, or an hundred dollars a week in cash. But if they think the price too high, that their bargain would be a hard one, then they can go to hell if they choose to and deserve to, while he will go where he can get that amount of money, either in some other place, or at some other business. The "settled pastor" has had all these points settled,—for a year, sometimes, and sometimes for life; and I have heard of pastors who, not dying soon enough, were hired by their churches to hold their tongues, and let some one else talk who could better please the people; and of others who, if not allowed to preach, would sue their people at the law, to get the annual stipend "written in the bond." Of course few things could be more comforting to many young men, coming out of college with weak backs, flabby muscles, dyspeptic stomachs, overworked brains, throats enveloped and enfeebled by white cravats, and also slightly infected by a disease called laziness; persons supported at home by their parents, in college by charity, and in the seminary by some fund,—than to become convinced of the fact that they were called of God to leave the world at large to go to perdition the shortest way, while they were specially selected to be pastors of some rich, proud, and fashionable church, in which, when once settled, having the call of God confirmed and made an "effectual calling" by the force of a few thousand dollars a year, they could with their bedecked and jewelled families sit down, and most earnestly "consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet .... Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." To be sure, it may require considerable skill in balancing, to keep in the easy seat, to gratify the rich, to entertain the learned, to satisfy the poor, and to keep everything straight; but then, if one fails, why, the world is wide, and another vacancy and another call may supply his needs and keep him still in the "pastoral office." Such is the pastor in the estimation of many, and the young minister who fails to get a job of this kind, or to receive such a call, sometimes wanders about, idle and disconsolate, seeking rest and finding none.

But what is the scriptural idea of the matter? Let us examine the passage in question briefly. When speaking of the ascension of Jesus, Paul remarks that "He gave (or appointed) some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers."—Eph. 4: 11. I do not propose lengthily to investigate the claims and conditions of each of these classes. In passing, however, I may remark a word concerning them.

I. The Apostles. An apostle (apostolos) signifies simply one sent forth, or sent off; a messenger, an ambassador, envoy, and sometimes the commander of an expedition, &c. It comes from the Greek apostello or "sent forth," which is often used in the New Testament. Apostolos is rendered messenger (Phil. 2: 25), and applied to Epaphroditus. It is also rendered messengers, and applied to "the brethren" sent with Titus in 2 Cor. 8: 23. In John 13: 16, it is translated "he that is sent," who is not greater than him that sent him. In the seventy-eight other instances where it is found in the New Testament, it is not translated, but transferred—apostles. An apostle, then, is one sent. He may be sent by the Phillipians, or by the churches, if so be he is their messenger, or apostle, or he may have been sent by Christ, and if so, he is, like the twelve, the apostle or messenger of Jesus Christ. Whether there have been any other apostles since the first preaching of Christ I do not undertake to decide. When Paul's apostleship was questioned, he could say: "Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen the Lord?" Whether other professed apostles could abide this test, or prove that they had been personally sent by the Lord, may be doubted until demonstrated. Evangelists, and all christian laborers, may have been sent by the Holy Spirit, by the personal mandate of Christ.

This seems to have been the case with apostles in ancient time. Yet if they can work "the signs of an apostle" "in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds" (2 Cor. 12: 12), then their case will seem more clear: but if "the signs of an apostle" in these instances are only the saying over of forms, or the performing of ceremonies, the matter will seem more doubtful; while, if the tokens of their apostleship consist mainly in leading captive weak women, in making misguided men [illegible] choosing out seven men full of faith and the Holy Ghost to set over these matters, putting themselves over them to manage the concern; then, if these be the only tokens of their apostleship, it may be doubted—not, whether there are apostles, for Mormons, Irvingites, or Christian churches may send their "messengers," or apostles—but whether such persons are truly the apostles of Jesus Christ, as were those whom he sent in days of old.

"But God hath set some in the church; first, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers; after that, miracles; then gifts of healings, helps, governments, diversities of tongues." I. Cor. 12: 28. And if God has set them in the church, they ought to be in the church now, and in it always." Truly spoken; but what do you mean by "in the church"? Do you mean by it in your little narrow, contemptible, bigoted society or sect? If so let me say I do not think it is big enough to hold one apostle, much less a dozen. Possibly if Paul was in it now, i. e. in your church, you would very soon turn him out. But the apostles are in the church. The church is one body. Successive generations do not make successive churches, nor do they mar the unity of the "one body," and the one building. Paul is in the church to-day, sleeping in Jesus though he be; "being dead, yet speaketh." God hath set the apostles "in the church"; but where? We set great stones in a building, but where? In the roof, in the sides, all along up and down? No; but in the foundation! There is just where God set the apostles FIRST; not second, third, or fourth; but he hath "set some in the church; FIRST, apostles; secondarily, prophets; thirdly, teachers," and in this divine arrangement, the church is "built upon the foundation of the APOSTLES and prophets; Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone." Eph. 2: 20. There is where God put the apostles "in the church." Let them stay there then; or at least if others come let each of them show "the signs of an apostle," "with all patience," before we be required to believe.

II. As prophets are put into the foundation with the apostles, so in the passage under consideration, as he appointed some persons to be apostles, so he appointed some to be prophets. The Greek word propheetees, or prophet, signified an interpreter of the gods, one who declared oracles in the name of a god, or expounded what the god had spoken. The Hebrew word nah vee signified one who, impelled by a divine influence, or by the divine spirit, rebuked kings and nations, or foretold future events. When Moses was sent to Pharaoh, "The Lord said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh; and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet." Exod. 7: 1. That is, you shall suggest and teach what shall be said, and Aaron shall declare it to Pharaoh as your spokesman. The work of the prophet, then, was declarative. God revealed himself to him, and he told others what he learned of God, whether referring to events past, present or future. Hence Abraham was called a prophet. Gen. 20: 7; also the patriarchs, Ps 105: 15, "Do my prophets no harm." As the prophet's work was to declare God's will, persons might be prophets without receiving direct communications from God, provided they declared what he had really spoken, even though it was revealed to others. Hence Miriam is called a prophetess, (Exod. 15: 20); though she had no direct communications from God like Moses. See Num. 12: 1–6. So persons were educated for the work of teaching under the guidance of other prophets, as the young men at Gilgal called "the sons of the prophets" under Elisha, while the direct inspiration of God sometimes came upon men who were neither prophets, nor sons of prophets, as upon Amos, who was an herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit. The prophetic inspiration was occasional rather than constant. Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are. The seventy elders with Eldad and Medad once prophesied in the camp of Israel; on one occasion Saul was found among the prophets; and Balaam prophesied of blessing when he would have cursed Israel. Sometimes also prophets departed from the Lord, and were punished for their sins. See 1 Kings 13: 11–29.

In the New Testament also, the same breadth of application of the term prophet may be observed. Some there were who prophesied like Agabus, and foretold future events; while others prophesied by declaring anew the truths already revealed. This prophesying was not by any means the business of an exclusive caste or set of men, a clergy, as our modern term then, who might prophesy, as distinguished from a laity who might not; for in the last days when the Spirit was to be poured out upon all flesh, [illegible] Hence Philip had four virgin daughters which did prophesy, and even before Christ came Anna was a prophetess in Israel. But the ordinary prophesying in the church was the privilege of all. "For ye may all prophesy, one by one." "Covet earnestly the best gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy." "He that prophesieth edifieth the church." "Greater is he that prophesieth than he that speaketh with tongues." "He that prophsieth speaketh to edification, to exhortation, and comfort." "If all prophesy, and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned, he is convinced of all, he is judged of all." See 1 Cor. 14: 24. Women were to pray or prophesy with their heads covered; men with their heads uncovered. 1 Cor. 11: 4, 5. Every man woman or child, who could speak to edification, exhortation and comfort, it seems might at proper times be allowed to prophesy. Wherever the Spirit of God prompted to this work, there was liberty to do it in order and in decency; and by its power many were convinced of sin, and would worship and adore the Lord. Of course some might prophesy more intelligently or acceptably than others, and so they might be termed especially prophets; particularly if to them God granted sometimes direct revelations of his will. Here then we find apostles and prophets set, or appointed in the church, as an integral portion of the same.

III. He appointed some to be evangelists. An evangelist is simply a bringer of good tidings, or a Gospel preacher; Gospel being only good news. The Gospel is termed evangelion, the preaching of it is evangelizo to evangelize, and the man who did it was called an evangelistees or evangelist. "We declare to you glad tidings," or we evangelize to you. Acts 13: 32, &c., &c. Philip was called an evangelist (Acts 21: 8), and Timothy was bidden to "do the work of an evangelist."—2 Tim. 4: 5. The word only is found in these places, and in Eph. 4: 11. Paul is not called an evangelist, but he was such most assuredly. Every man who preaches the gospel is an evangelist—he proclaims the evangel, the good news, he evangelizes, and he is an evangelist just so far as he does it. Whether he preach in courts or halls, in palaces or hovels, in temples or in caves, he evangelizes, and is an evangelist. Whether he preach in one place, ten places, or an hundred places; whether he preach there one year, ten years or fifty years; so that he preach the pure Gospel of God to the perishing sons of men,—he does "the work of an evangelist." The idea that only itinerants, travelers, persons having no certain dwelling places, are evangelists, is a great mistake. They may do the work of evangelists more fully, than idler men, but all who preach Christ's good news are properly called evangelists.

IV. Pastors and Teachers. I join the two together, because Paul does. He does not say some to be pastors, and some to be teachers,—but some to be "pastors and teachers." And in 1 Cor. 12: 28, after Apostles and Prophets, he omits all mention of evangelists and pastors, showing that he did not consider them necessarily separate, and says: "thirdly, TEACHERS." The pastor's work, then, is nearly related to the work of teaching: pastors and teachers were, it would seem, usually, if not always, identical or nearly so. A pastor should be a teacher, though a teacher may not be a pastor. The term pastors occurs no where else in the New Testament; but this passage is frequently quoted, by almost every man who seems disinclined to do the more active service in the Lord's field, thus: "Well, the Lord has set pastors in the church. A pastor is a man settled to preach to some church where they will pay him for it; and I think my calling is to be a pastor, and I shall stay in it as long as any one will keep me, and be a pastor, for God has set pastors in the church." If this position were correct they would by it exclude all evangelists, or preachers of the Gospel from their churches; and take upon themselves the offices of prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers and all. For their idea is, God has set a diversity of gifts in the church; for example, sleek, comfortable looking pastors where churches are rich and can pay them pretty well, and gaunt, hungry looking evangelists, for fields where money is scarce and labor severe, and they! they feel specially called to be pastors! But Christ has set all these things in the church; and no church can, without a most injurious departure from the mind of Christ, diverge from the divine arrangement, and put one gift, be it that of pastor or any other one, in the place of the many which God has given to the church.

What, then, is a pastor? Is he a salaried officer of the church, preaching constantly to a single congregation, [illegible]

The Greek word poimeen, rendered pastor, occurs eighteen times in the New Testament. It is a very simple word, and has a very obvious meaning. Seventeen times our translators have translated it uniformly from Greek into English; and once they have translated it from Greek into Latin! The Greek word poimnee signifies a flock or herd of cattle, especially of sheep. Hence came the word poimeen a shepherd, or herdsman. This is its sole and simple meaning. Hence also came poimaino, to feed, tend, guide, or rule a flock—doing a shepherd's duty to them. Now this word poimeen, or shepherd, occurring eighteen times in the New Testament, is translated by the English word shepherd, SEVENTEEN TIMES, and by the Latin word pastor in this single instance. It is rendered shepherd by Wicklif, Tyndale, and Cranmer, but King James' translators, instead of putting in the proper English translation of the word, as they did in the other seventeen instances, thought it best to insert it here in Latin, "pastor," a word having the same meaning, but needing to be translated into English for English readers. Why was this? Was it for the same reason that they used other words such as "bishoprick," "Easter," "Babtizo," &c., so that the common people, not understanding them, would be forced to come to them for light, and so they could explain the words to fit the customs of the church, rather than to modify the church rites to correspond to the meaning of the words?

For the Crisis.

Paradoxical.

We want a faith that brings to view
Those things that are unseen,
That reaches for a world to come,
And lifts the veil between.

We would "endure" the woes of earth,
And every sorrow bear,
"As seeing Him invisible,"
And on Him cast our care.

"As poor, yet making many rich,"
"As sorrowful, yet" still
"Always rejoicing" in the Lord,
And in his holy will.

"As having nothing, yet" through grace
"Possessing" all we need,
Heirs to a rich inheritance,
Yea, to "all things" indeed.

For the Crisis.

The Sixth Seal.

BY S. S. BREWER.

"And I beheld when he had OPENED the SIXTH SEAL, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood."—REV. 6: 12.

The above portion of holy scripture is of a very interesting character, and the events declared by the Almighty to transpire both at their opening and during their consecutive fulfillment, are of so marked a nature, that it seems impossible for any one to doubt when so complete a history of their accomplishment can be obtained. The opening of this seal was to be marked by a "great earthquake," and closed by the consummation of the conflict of ages, in bringing "the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman," to hide "themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains," and to say unto the "mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; FOR THE GREAT DAY OF HIS WRATH IS COME, and who shall be able to stand?" It does seem positive to my mind, that every living being on earth is present at this grand, solemn, and final scene. "Hide us from the wrath of the Lamb," is the despairing exclamation that falls from the lips of all out of Christ. "Hide us from the face of Him that sitteth on the THRONE." This is doubtless a parallel to Matt. 25: 31, 32,—"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." The disposition of the two classes is very definitely marked. 46th verse,—"And these shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal." The Apostle Paul to the church at Thessalonica presents the same idea in his 2 Epistle 1: 7, 8;—"When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power; when he shall come to be glorified in his saints." Thus we see, by a comparison of the plain teaching of our Lord in Matt. 25, and the Apostle's letter, that [illegible] children of the wicked one." To which class, dear reader, do you now belong? O! for your own present, future and eternal well being, see to it instantly. Mark well—but two classes, when the Son of man sits upon the throne of his glory: one class go away into everlasting punishment, the other into life eternal.

If this seal under which we are now living brings us to the great day of his wrath, we should most certainly with becoming interest and godly sincerity be led to inquire into the subject, by a careful examination of God's word, and a comparison of such facts as history may furnish as corresponding. The first event as noted by the Revelator, and that which is to distinguish the OPENING OF THE SIXTH SEAL, is,

First. "A GREAT EARTHQUAKE." The Savior in the twenty-fourth of Matthew declared there should be earthquakes in divers places before his coming to judge the world; but at the opening of this seal there was to be a great earthquake. History furnishes this fact. The first extract is from Blackwood's Magazine of July 9th, 1844.

"On the morning of All-Saints day, the 1st of Nov., 1775, Lisbon was almost torn up from the foundations by the most terrible earthquake on European record. As it was a high Romish festival, the population were crowding to the churches, which were lighted up in honor of the day. About a quarter before ten the first shock was felt, which lasted the extraordinary length of six or seven minutes, then followed an interval of about five minutes. The concussions were so violent in both instances that nearly all the solid buildings were dashed to the ground, and the principal part of the city almost wholly ruined. The terror of the population, rushing through the streets, gathered in the churches, or madly attempting to escape into the fields, may be imagined; but the whole scene of horror, death, and ruin, exceeds all description. The ground split into chasms, into which the people were plunged in their flight. Crowds fled to the water, but the Tagus, agitated like the land, suddenly rose to an astonishing height, burst upon the land, and swept away all within its reach. It was said to have risen to the height of five and twenty or thirty feet above its usual level, and to have sunk again as much below it. And this phenomenon occurred four times."

The second is taken from the Cyclopedia of History, p. 639, printed and published by Case, Tiffany and Burnham, 1845, Hartford, Ct.

"Nov. 1st, 1755, Lisbon was destroyed by the most terrible earthquake that has ever occurred: 60,000 persons perished in six minutes. The sea first retired, then rolled in, rising fifty feet above its usual bed. The largest mountain in Portugal rocked and split asunder, and sent forth flames and clouds of dust. The shock was felt nearly all over Europe, in the north part of Africa, in the Atlantic, and even in the West Indies; a vast wave swept over the coast of Spain, and in some places sixty feet in height. Near Morocco the earth swallowed up about 10,000 persons, with their herds, and then closed over them."

Thus in a most positive manner has God marked the sixth seal. The above extracts seem to correspond precisely with the prediction. We will proceed to notice briefly the next event in order as seen in vision by the Revelator.

Second. "And the sun became black as sackcloth of hair." Among the great number of historical testimonies concerning the dark day of May 19th, 1780, I shall present but one, which is so emphatic, and so much to the point, that this must suffice:

"In the month of May, 1780, there was a very terrific dark day in New England, when 'all faces seemed to gather blackness,' and the people were filled with fear. There was great distress in the village where Edward Lee lived; 'men's hearts failing them for fear' that the judgment was at hand, and the neighbors all flocked around the holy man, for his lamp was trimmed and shining brighter than ever, amidst the unnatural darkness. Happy and joyful in God, he pointed them to their only refuge from the wrath to come, and spent the gloomy hours in earnest prayer for the distressed multitude. His nephew, who was then a little child, in after life retained a lively recollection of that scene, and in his childish feelings are an interesting exhibition of the manner in which Mr. Lee was regarded, for he felt not the least alarm in his presence, thinking that he was perfectly safe where his good uncle was, even if the day of judgment had come.'"—Tract No. 379 of Amer. Tract Society. Life of Edward Lee, of Mass.

Third. "And the moon became as blood." My extracts on this point shall be very brief. I will quote the following from a letter of Mr. Beadle, of Aleppo, and published in the Missionary Herald of June, 1842, p. 224. It is an account of an earthquake at that place in 1822. He says:—

"On the night of the earthquake there was something peculiar in the atmosphere, the moon appearing as red as blood. This greatly alarmed the inhabitants, who were continually crying out, 'Now we shall hear the trumpet sound! [illegible]' [illegible] most remarkable phenomenon here that I ever heard of, except the falling stars. At 3 A. M., the moon, which had been obscured by a cloud for some hours, burst forth of a deep, BLOOD RED COLOR, with a black cross of equal proportions over the face."

For a more particular account of the signs in the moon and stars, see articles No. 13 and 14 of the series on "Evening Shadows."

Dear reader, we now invite your attention to the last sign under this seal, to be witnessed by this generation, previous to the departure of the heavens as a scroll, which inaugurates the great day of God's wrath, which is the Fourth point under consideration. "And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind." The fulfillment of this prediction, so wonderful in its nature, and so alarming to those who witnessed it, is described by a writer in the N. Y. Journal of Commerce, of Nov. 15, 1833, from which the following is a very short extract:—

"Neither myself, nor any one of the family, heard any report; and were I to hunt through nature for a simile, I could not find one so apt to illustrate the appearance of the heavens, as that which St. John uses in the prophecy above quoted. 'It rained fire,' says one; another, 'It was like the large flakes of snow before a coming storm, or large drops of rain before a shower.' I admit their fitness for common accuracy; but they came far short of the accuracy of the figure used by the prophet: 'The stars of heaven fell unto the earth.' They were not sheets, or flakes, or drops of fire; but they were what the world understand by 'falling stars,' and one speaking to his fellow in the midst of the scene would say, 'See how the stars fall!' And he who heard would not pause to correct the astronomy of the speaker, any more than he would be so precise as to reply, 'the sun does not move,' to one who should tell him the sun is rising. The stars fell 'even as the fig tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind.' Here is the exactness of the prophet."

Extracts from the People's Magazine, Boston, Jan. 1834, on the falling stars of Nov. 13, 1833:—

"The Rockingham, Va., Register calls it, 'A rain of fire,'—thousands of stars being seen at once; some said it began with considerable noise.

The Journal of Commerce informs, that 'three hundred miles this side of Liverpool the phenomenon was as splendid there as here;' and that in 'St. Lawrence Co.' there was a 'snow storm' during the phenomenon, in which the 'falling stars' appeared 'like lightning.' ... That in 'Germantown, Pa.,' they seemed like 'showers of great hail.'

The Lancaster, Pa., Examiner says, 'The air was filled with innumerable meteors or stars; ... hundreds of thousands of brilliant bodies might be seen falling at every moment, ... sloping their descent towards the earth, at an angle of about forty-five degrees, resembling flashes of fire.'"

The next is the great and final scene, as described by the Revelator, which is the passing away of the heavens as a scroll, which, in all probability, will take the world with as much surprise as did either of the preceding events under this seal. The Apostle Peter certifies to this fact, in the following very definite language: "The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up." Luke 17: 28. "Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed."

Dearly beloved reader, we are now verging rapidly to the day that God has appointed to judge the world. Each setting sun leaves the days of our probation less. O how solemn is the time in which we are living! The world has no assurance of an hour's safety; and how stands the account with you? May God assist us, in our great weakness, to strive to be found of him in peace.

My dear brethren, preach the coming of Jesus! O ye ministers, preach it, pray it, live it. The work is almost ended; there is every thing testifying throughout creation, "Behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be." Let your work be done, and well and faithfully done, in the name and by the help of the all-sufficient grace of God. Soon, very soon, the opening heavens will reveal the once injured, but now the all-conquering, glory-crowned King of kings and Lord of lords. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." O "come quickly"! Amen and Amen.

For the Crisis.

Answer to Inquiry.

Some one has inquired of me, through the Crisis, whether the word used in Ps. 19: 17, which I suppose there means to turn back, always bears this sense. I have delayed a reply partly because I have not until lately found it convenient to refer to the best Hebrew Lexicon, that of Gesenius, and partly because I hardly understood the drift or purport of the question.

But I have lately consulted Gesenius, who gives for the general or leading senses as follows: "1. To turn about, to turn back, to return, i. e., to lead or bring back." The whole account of the word, in its various forms and with citation of various examples, runs through one or two octavo pages. In one instance Gesenius remarks the sense of turning even though not to a former place—as if the sense of turning instead of returning were exceptional.

From this it seems clear that the general use of the word makes the translation I have suggested of Ps. 19: 17 most probably correct. If it is incorrect, then there must be a peculiar use of the word in that passage.

And here a word about my second reason for delay. What if I had found, and simply reported, that the word in question does not "always" mean so or so? Would my querist have been any wiser? If to turn back were the exceptional and rare sense of the word, it might still be the actual sense in this passage. And I may say that I felt warranted in suggesting this sense, not because the word necessarily means so, but partly because this was an allowable sense of the word, and partly because the argument in the passage seemed to require this sense.

Let me remark, then, that while Lexicons and Concordances are invaluable in their place, they can rarely yield demonstrations of any particular sense in a particular passage. Almost all words have their varieties, shades, and latitudes of meaning; and they accordingly require the use of various terms in translation. Very few words have precise and exact equivalents in other languages. Hence there is required the exercise of judgment and discrimination, sometimes very nice and subtle, in giving the sense of words and passages. There can of course be expected no perfect and infallible translation, and each one is left to the right or rather necessity of such "private judgment" as he may be capable of using. But the private judgment is sometimes very modest according as it is very well informed.

I may here remark that there are passages, some of great account with my friends, where I have an opinion as to the sense, but I can not demonstrate it. Of two different senses each is possible. In such cases I find safety only in saying that I can not rely on the text for an argument, but prefer passages which will prove the point maintained. C. F. H.

Prepare War.

Messrs. Editors:—Being employed for a few days in inspecting some Enfield rifles for the government, the business has naturally awakened some thoughts in my mind relating to the present state of the world; and the word of the Lord to Joel, "prepare war," has vividly flashed before me. The preparation now being made for prosecuting the war does not look much like peace. I am inclined to believe that one effect of this rebellion will be to awaken the United States to fulfill their part of the preparation spoken of. This marshaling of armies and expenditure of millions of money for implements of war, will, in my opinion, reach further than to combat with our Southern neighbors; for, in that day, the slain of the Lord are to be from one end of the earth to the other. We read in Habakkuk, that the Lord "beheld, and drove asunder the nations." And it is prophesied of Christ, that he shall "dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." We may infer from this, that just previous to the Lord's return, all diplomacy between nations will be broken up, and a hurricane of war will sweep over the earth; and the slaughter will be such that there will be but few men left. This time, in my opinion, is just before us. To-day there was brought into the room a new invention, which will probably be more destructive of human life than any now used. It is a breech-loading cannon, so constructed that the cartridges are put into a hopper, and by turning a crank, they are discharged as fast as a man can turn. A battery of fifty of these brought to bear upon an army, would annihilate it in a short time.

In conclusion, where are we? Watchman, what of the night? Does the morning dawn? Does the rumbling of artillery and tramping of cavalry and infantry indicate to the waiting ones that deliverance is nigh? Then let us gird on the armor, and be prepared for the baptism of trouble that will surely come upon the earth, such as never was since there was a nation. D. N. Smith.

The World's Crisis
and
SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, Dec. 4, 1861.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

Hereafter all letters, communications, remittances and orders for the World's Crisis are to be directed to ELDER MILES GRANT, Boston, Mass.

The 1260 Days.

It is a matter of considerable interest to the student of prophecy, and the lover of the appearing of Jesus, to ascertain the date of the commencement, and consequent termination of the 1260 days of Rev. 12: 6, the "time, and times, and half a time," of Rev. 12: 14, the "forty and two months" of Rev. 13: 5, and the "time and times and the dividing of time" of Dan. 7: 25, all of which are thought to refer to the duration of the same power or system of persecution of the saints of God.

Daniel says, "The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings.—And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws; and they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and the dividing of time."—Dan. 7: 23-25. John says, "The woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days."—Rev. 12: 6. Again, "To the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent."—Rev. 12: 14. And in Rev. 13: 5, John says, when speaking of the leopard beast, "they worshipped the beast, saying. Who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him? And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds and tongues, and nations."—Rev. 13: 4-7. From the fact that the "little horn" of Daniel and the leopard beast of John are represented as doing the same work, for the same length of time, and evidently in the same locality, it is very evident that they symbolize the same thing; and so far as we know, all Protestant writers of any note, are agreed that they denote Papal Rome in its union of civil and ecclesiastical power, during the time specified by the 1260 days.

A "time" signifies a year. Hence, we read of Nebuchadnezzar, that he was to have his portion "with the beasts of the field, till seven times" passed "over him," i. e., during seven years. Then it follows that "the time and times and the dividing of time" in Daniel, and the "time and times and half a time" of John represent the same period. The only ground for a doubt as to the number of years specified, is in the word times, which is indefinite, when considered by itself, as it might mean two or more. This point, however, appears to be settled in the fact that the same time is expressed in Rev. 12: 6 by 1260 days, and in Rev. 13: 5 by "forty and two months," representing the same period of time when the saints were in the hands of this persecuting power. As three hundred and sixty days were reckoned for a year, and thirty days for a month, the "forty and two months," and the "thousand two hundred and threescore days" are just equal to three years and a half. By this means we ascertain that the word times in Daniel and John, in the passages under examination, signify two times, or years. The Bishop's Bible reads, "They shall be given under his power, until a time, two times, and half a time." Thus we think the point is most clearly settled that the "time and times and the dividing of time" are equal to three years and a half, or the "forty and two months," or 1260 days.

Another point of interest here presents itself; to wit, are these days or years, literal or symbolical? As they are found in symbolical prophecy, we should expect them to be used symbolically, i. e., a day for a year. When we notice the duration of Daniel's "little horn" power, and the leopard beast of John, it appears certain that their work was not done in three and a half literal years; but we think it may be satisfactorily proved the work was accomplished in twelve hundred and sixty symbolical years, i. e., each day for a year. [illegible]

"Short Articles."

We call special attention to Bro. Sheldon's remarks on "Short Articles." Whoever wishes to have their articles read with interest, must condense what they have to say into as few words as possible. We are always rejoiced to receive a good supply of short articles, because we expect, by this means, to furnish a paper that will be read with pleasure. The people of this age are in a hurry, and will not stop to read long articles in a paper, nor sit easy under long sermons. If the whole subject can not be put into one or two columns, then make a division in it, and let us have it in two parts. One sheet of foolscap coarsely written will make about a column in the Crisis. We have no fears that the articles will be too short; but are frequently made sad at the sight of some long articles. We feel thus because our readers will feel so when they see it.

So far as our labor is concerned, it would be less, perhaps, if articles were long; but we prefer to do much more work, if necessary, for the sake of having short articles. If they are short, then many can be heard, as in a good prayer and conference meetings; whereas, if they are long, then only a few can speak, and it becomes tedious. People will read a whole page of short pieces, when they would not think of reading a single article occupying one fourth of the same space.

Let us say once more to many excellent contributors, BE SHORT. Condense your best thoughts into as few words as possible, baptize them with prayer for the blessing of God upon the readers, and with great pleasure we will help you scatter them to the hungry "flock of God." Now is the time for action. The world is all aroused, and wondering over passing and coming events. Let every one, who can, and many can who think they can't, help to sound the alarm to this last generation. Our work is short, but earnest. Let none be slumbering now. Our foes are all awake, and the last struggle will soon be ended—ended for ever.—o.

Scripture References.

We wish to make a suggestion to those who write for the columns of the Crisis. It is this: Always quote the Scripture introduced as proof of any point, instead of merely referring to it by naming the chapter and verse. It will be found a fact, that but few of the readers ever look up the passages. In these days of hurry, people wish every thing brought within their reach at once, or they will not take the trouble to examine it at all; besides, many, when they read our paper, have no means at hand for the purpose of looking up the passages; consequently, all the labor of writing, editing, and printing, is lost; whereas, if the Scripture named was fully written out, then the reader is obliged to give it an examination.

And while speaking on this point, let us urge upon all who quote Scripture in their articles, to always turn to the passage in the Bible, and write it word for word as there found. This course will save us much labor.—o.

To Preachers.

Our readers are anxious to read weekly communications from our preaching brethren. They wish to know what each Watchman sees and hears, and what he thinks of these times, in relation to the evidences of the coming of the Son of man. Never did the church need the benefit of your counsels and exhortations more than at the present. Please send them a portion at once, and comfort their heavy hearts. Do not forget that many of our readers hear no preaching about the coming of Christ, have no prayer meetings to attend where any one sympathizes with them, hence they are very anxious to hear from those of "like precious faith." Come, brethren, write a few words to cheer them. Do it to please the Lord; for remember, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—o.

"Present Truth."

"Circumstances alter cases"; in the same manner it may be said of truth, that aside from its intrinsic value, abstractly considered, it may and frequently does possess an additional power by reason of the peculiar circumstances connected with it. And this is what we suppose to be meant by St. Peter,—"Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth." 2 Pet. 1: 12.

The principle involved, necessarily makes the discernment and proper appreciation of this class of truths highly important, frequently of unspeakable importance. Such for example was the nature of the specific truths referred to by the Apostle in the instance before us. The truth that the Messiah, so long looked for by the Jews, had already come,—had performed his Divine mission on earth,—had been raised from the dead, and was doing the part of High Priest in heaven, was to the Jews of St. Peter's time pre-eminently present truth. [illegible] come to ask what, in the sense aforesaid, may be called "present truth" at this time? That all truth belonging to the Christian dispensation should be unceasingly preached and believed, we unhesitatingly affirm. The whole counsel of God must be declared, and if one class of men refuse to do this, doubtless God will raise up others who will; as anciently, when, "if these should hold their peace, the stones would cry out." But is there anything, of the character described, belonging to these times, and which can be urged upon the attention of the church and world as claiming their special attention? We have to say, in reply to such an inquiry, we think there is—truth peculiarly adapted to these times; truth God is specially pleased should be preached at this time. This is the truth of Christ's speedy, personal, and pre-millennial advent and reign on the earth; having for its practical end, the warning of the world, and the stirring up the Church to the remembrance of her forgotten hope, and consequently, to a better preparation for the glorious event. This work has been in progress for several years past, and still is proclaimed with no prospect of abatement. Upwards of thirty years since, that remarkable Oriental scholar and linguist, the Rev. Joseph Wolff, D. D., L. L. D., had traveled and preached this doctrine from the river Thames to the Indian ocean. Hundreds and thousands of the ministry of the present day, many of them among the most learned and godly of the age, have been preaching the same doctrine. The works of Elliot, Bickersteth, Harbershon, McNeil, and many others who have treated this subject, have been very largely read; while the nearly fifty volumes of Cumming—mainly treating upon this or kindred subjects—are probably read wherever the English language is read.

In this country the work has been carried on chiefly, though by a more humble, yet not less earnest people, than in other lands. It has been helped on by the scholarly reputation and dauntless christian zeal of such men as Pres. Lord, Hitchcock, Bp. Hopkins, Drs. Tyng, Nicholson, and many other like-minded preachers of the Gospel. Lord's "Theological and Literary Journal" has recently claimed to be read by six thousand clergymen,—a journal published in N. Y., largely devoted to the exposition of this doctrine; and we readily count seven or eight periodicals that are regularly published in this country—principally devoted to this subject. Some of these persons may hold peculiar views relative to the prophetic periods, or the age to come; but we count it a remarkable fact, that so vast a company, differing in religious bias, educated in different schools of theology, and many of them widely separated by sea and land, yet all come to the general conclusion that the second personal advent of the Lord may be looked for at just about this time, say within the cycle of a few years.

The evidence in favor of such a position is found first in the fact that, it is almost universally conceded the consecutive and discursive prophecies are now nearly fulfilled,—leaving only the question as to the nature of the event, to divide the christian world on the subject. And to this may be added the trumpet-tongued and world-wide signs of the times—signs that need not be mistaken by any man who will trouble himself to compare the times with the prophecies that belong to the last part of the present dispensation. Such, for example, as are found in Dan. 12, Luke 21: 25, 26, 2 Tim. 3, Rev. 11: 18, &c.

May our Lord Jesus Christ lead us into all truth.—M.

A Question Answered.

A correspondent asks, "Do you look for the Savior in the time of troubles and commotions, or in the time of peace?"

We reply, we do not perceive from reading the prophecies that the time immediately preceding the Lord's second advent is to be particularly marked by either universal peace or universal commotions. But to this we may add,

1st. When the Lord makes his second advent to earth, there is to immediately follow "a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation." Dan. 12: 1. "For by fire, and by his sword, will the Lord plead with all flesh: and the slain of the Lord shall be many." Isa. 66: 16. "Behold evil shall go forth from nation to nation, and a great whirlwind shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth; and the slain of the Lord shall be at that day, from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth." Jer. 25: 32, 33. But should such, and many like passages of the Old Testament be called in question, as applying to this subject, we remark, the New Testament is equally explicit. We there read of the drying up of the (symbolic) river Euphrates, preparatory to "The battle of the great day of God Almighty." Rev. 16. Again, it is recorded of the redeemed that they shall then say,—"The NATIONS WERE ANGRY, and Thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged." Rev. 11: 18.

Evidently this is indicative of universal national trouble. Preparatory to this there must be much running to and fro (see Dan. 12: 4, and Nahum 2: 3, 4) and, as we may suppose, much perplexity. [illegible] point. "And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations, with PERPLEXITY." Luke 21: 25. That this time of sad "perplexity"—of "evil"—(or rebellion and insurrection against lawful means,) going "forth from nation to nation,"—where men are "running to and fro" on "chariots of lightning,"—when the mighty men are waked up, and "the valiant men are in scarlet,"—is now upon us, we cannot for a moment doubt. Were this at any other time, or seen only in a very limited extent, it might be otherwise; but occurring at this point, where we run out all lines of prophecy, and being so universally true, we find no room or heart to disbelieve what is so clearly indicated by the present signs of the times. Said a recent "Boston Journal," "The nations of the world are in a state of fearful commotion. The manufacture of rifled cannon, Minnie rifles, and death-dealing missiles of all sorts, was never so active in the world's history, and there are no signs of cessation. War, and not peace, seems to be the predominant idea. The world is one vast camp, and the military power everywhere predominates." Said the N. Y. Independent of a more recent date:—"We are at the point where prophecy converges most swiftly toward its accomplishment, and when all trumpets foreshown in the Apocalypse seem to be sounding at once on the air, all vials to be poured out together on the lands." And again;—"There is every indication that this will be a year of commotions in the earth, and distress of nations, almost without parallel since the beginning of the Christian era."

2nd. Yet, with all this, it is probable that it will be said and perhaps generally felt that there is no occasion for alarm, until, as a snare, the event suddenly astonishes and overwhelms the world. "For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." Luke 21: 35. "For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking . . . and knew not until the flood came and took them all away, so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Matt. 24: 38, 39. "When they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." "But ye, brethren, are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are the children of light, and the children of the day." 1 Thess. 5: 3, 4.

The query may arise, how nations can be expected to fight after so awful an event as the coming of the Lord, and the resurrection and translation of the righteous. But we are to bear in mind that such is the divinely appointed judgment that is to fall upon the anti-christian, or Christ-rejecting nations, and when once God shall remove the moral restraints now existing, it will be an easy matter for every man's hand to be against his brother. To the foregoing scripture we might add Rev. 7: 3, Ps. 91: 5-8; compare with Jer. 25: 32, and Dan. 12: 1,—but our space forbids. May God put his seal upon us, and deliver us from that time.—M.

The Right Spirit.

A few days since we received a communication for the Crisis, which we thought might not be best to publish at present. Accordingly we dropped a note to the writer, expressing our convictions, and received in return the following:—

"Dear Bro. Grant:—Yours under date of Nov. 15th is before me. . . . It was not necessary to write me on the subject, for of course you know better than I do what is proper to publish, and what to withhold; and beside, I am not one of that kind to feel hurt if any thing written by me is not published. God knows my heart. I would not do any thing to retard the spread of the truths set forth in his holy word. I wish nothing more than the advancement of his cause and kingdom on the earth. . . No, my brother, I would not do one thing to disturb the harmony of God's children; but rather to promote peace and unity. . May God give you strength and grace sufficient to sustain you in your labors."

We think every reader will be pleased with the spirit of the foregoing. It indicates the true feelings of a follower of Christ. It is a pleasure to suffer with such noble hearts, and reckon them as our brethren. It is quite a victory gained over human nature when we are willing "To be little and unknown,

Loved and prized by God alone." G.

Preparations for War.

The business has never been so active in the navy yard at Charlestown, as at the present time and this is probably the case in nearly every navy yard in the northern states. There are three hundred men in in the machine shop and foundry, under the superintendence of Mr. Merriam, the master machinist, besides all the other workmen. The work is going on day and night.

Says the Boston Journal:—

"There are two castings per day in the foundries, which require for supplies ten tons of iron and one ton of copper; and whatever is cast to-day is fully completed in the machine and other shops to-morrow. The amount of labor and material employed is three times more at present than it has ever heretofore been."

Notwithstanding all these vast preparations for war [illegible]

itual reign of Christ. But this fact only confirms the prophecy of Paul in 1 Thess. 5: 3,—"When they shall say peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them." The next verse gives words of comfort to the faithful followers of Jesus:—"But ye, brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. Ye are all the children of light, and the children of the day." Why, are they "children of light?" Because they take heed unto the "sure word of prophecy . . . . as unto a light that shineth in a dark place." It follows, then, that those who neglect to study the prophets, relative to the coming of Christ, must walk in darkness concerning that great event. And it is a lamentable fact, that but very few are interested enough in those prophecies which refer to the second advent of our Savior, to either read or hear on the subject. This is one of the signs of the times as given by Paul. Were it not as it is, we should not be justified in looking for the immediate coming of Christ. The Lord foresaw the great indifference that many of his professed disciples would manifest towards his return to this world, and has noted it in the Book of truth, so that his children might see the sign when the time arrived for its accomplishment. And here we are at the present hour. May the Lord enable us to walk in the light, as it now shines from the prophetic page.—o.

Editorial Notices.

The Movement-Cure in every Chronic disease; a summary of its principles, processes and results. By Geo. H. Taylor, M. D., author of an exposition of the Movement-Cure; Physician of the Remedial Hygienic Institute of the City of New York.

The foregoing is the title of a pamphlet of sixty-four pages of interesting matter relative to a very successful mode of treating chronic diseases, without the aid of drugs. It contains several diagrams illustrating the treatment. From what we have seen and heard of its effects upon our friends in this city, we have very great confidence in this curative process, and do not hesitate to recommend it to all who are afflicted with chronic diseases. Those who wish for further information can address Geo. H. Taylor, M. D., 68 West Thirty-eighth Street, New York city.—o.

The Restitution; or, this earth, recovered from all the disabilities of the fall, to be the inheritance of the meek—"the purchased possession" promised to "the children of the resurrection." By the author of "The time of the end," "Analysis of Sacred Chronology," etc.

This is an excellent tract of 24 pages, well adapted to those who need light on the subject of the saints' inheritance, showing very clearly that this earth, when restored to its Eden-like state, will be the future home of the children of God. The work is for sale at the Advent Herald office, Boston.—o.

The Truth on the coming of Christ, the second time, unto salvation. By Charles W. Thayer, Union Springs, N. Y. Price 75 cts. per hundred, 250 copies for $1.50, and 500 copies for $3.00.

This is an excellent tract, of eight pages, well adapted for those who have not seen the light on the future personal coming of Christ. It consists, mostly, of well-arranged Scriptures, bearing on various points connected with the literal advent of our Savior. Send orders to Bro. Thayer.—o.

Every Body's Book.—The Bible view of the personality of God. The devil, his origin, personality, power and doom. By Phineas A. Smith, Rochester, N. Y. Price 6 cents, postage one cent, $4.00 per hundred, 50 cents per dozen. For sale by the author and at this office.

This is a book that "every body" should read.—o.

The Scientific American.—As many of our readers are mechanics, we would say to them, if they wish a valuable mechanical paper, they will find one in the Scientific American. The following from the Louisville Journal gives a very correct idea of it:—

"We do not believe that even in this age of cheap publications any work can be more reasonable than the terms of the Scientific American at $2 per annum, with twenty-five per cent discount for clubs of ten. It forms a yearly volume of 832 pages quarto, with an immense number of original engravings of patented machines, valuable inventions, and objects of scientific interest. There is not an industrial pursuit which does not receive a share of its attention. It contains official lists of patent claims, important statistics, practical recipes for useful domestic purposes, and has long stood, both in this country and Europe, as the highest authority in in the mechanic arts and sciences. There is no publication more valuable to the farmer, the miller, the engineer, the iron founder, the mechanic, or the manufacturer. We have never opened a number without learning something we never knew before, and obtaining valuable information for the benefit of our readers. The Publishers, Messrs. Munn & Co., of 37 Park Row, New York, have deserved the success which they have achieved. No one should visit that city without calling at their palatial establishment, which is a museum of inventive genius, collected from the entire world. If any of our friends away off in the country do not know this work, and will take our advice, they will mail $2 and become subscribers immediately, or by applying to the Publishers they can obtain a specimen copy gratis, [illegible]

A Misapprehension.—In the Crisis of Nov. 20th may be found an extract from Bro. R. Willard's letter, in which mention is made of a Bro. F., and of liberal offers made in his vicinity for preaching. The Bro. F. lives in California instead of New Jersey.—o.

Bro. John Howell.

The following letter from Sr. Howell to Bro. Johnson, of Lynn, Mass., will be read with interest by the friends of Bro. Howell. The letter was not designed for publication, but we trust Sr. H. will not censure us for giving it to our readers. Let the praying ones be fervent in prayer for Dear Bro. and Sr. Howell, that God may bless and sustain them in all their afflictions.—o.

Dear Bro. Johnson:—The note containing the money from yourself and Bro. Hastings has been most thankfully received. We felt truly that, though the Lord was sorely afflicting us, he had not forgotten or forsaken us. God grant, my dear brother, that He that has said "the liberal soul shall be made fat" may abundantly reward you; and, while you "lend to the Lord" of your earthly substance, my prayer is, that he may pay you an abundant interest.

My husband is very feeble indeed. He appears like a person just gone with consumption. If you should see him, you would not think it possible for him to get up again. He weighs only about sixty-seven pounds. He coughs dreadfully. The physician here says he is liable to die any day, and I may make up my mind for it. But how can I give him up? While there is life, is there not hope? He seems almost bloodless, having bled severely sixteen times from the right lung since last August; but he has great energy and power of endurance, and I still have a faint hope that in this climate he may rally again.

O pray for us, and request the dear brethren and sisters of Lynn to remember us in their prayers. We sigh for a land where there will be no failing lungs, and wasting forms. O "come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly," to give the weary rest, and life to the dead. My husband joins me in love to yourself and the dear friends in Lynn. Your Sister in affliction,
L. S. Howell.

P. S. If you see Bro. Hastings, please thank him for his remembrance of us.

Short Articles.—I don't generally read those long, long articles; and I hardly know a person who does. Don't believe that one out of a hundred does. They almost scare us,—the thought of wading through them is repulsive. Write short articles. An article over a column in length begins to be long. W. Sheldon.

Our Tract Column.

For the Crisis.

I make a few extracts from recent letters as follows: Bro. B. writes from Western N. Y., Nov. 4th, '61:—

"I have been to some new places to preach, and have held some very good meetings. I find great eagerness to hear on the "signs of the times," and TRACTS are greedily seized upon, providing they are free. By the way, are the tracts for the western fund all disposed of? If not I could make a good use of a quantity."

I have a few dollars yet left of the tract fund which I will divide, but I wish you could persuade some rich (or poor) folks out there to help! I send you 1200 pages of tracts.

Bro. S. writes from the far West, Nov. 6:—

"I have found the place for work,—hard work. I have got to preach the very first principles, faith, repentance, baptism, &c. O what a field! "Who is sufficient for these things?" Pray for me. Now I want tracts, tracts, tracts. How am I to get them? How am I to get them with only three cents in my pocket, and among strangers? I received 25 cts. from a friend while on my journey, to purchase tracts for him with, but when I came to start on the R. R., I found I had to pay just double what I had expected, so I had to use that money or stay among entire strangers, and spend all for food. He wants the tracts, and how am I to get them? I am now nearly ready for the conflict. Soon as I get rested and take a glance at the field I will be in! I must have tracts! The field is large—tracts are the things to prepare the people to hear. If you can afford, please send me a few. O how I dislike to ask for tracts gratuitously. I would buy them if possible." &c.

That's the style of correspondence that comes to me frequently, making my heart ache and stirring me up to work even beyond my power. I send you 2400 pages of Tracts. I will try and help you what I can. I have five loaves and a few small fishes, but what are they among so many?

But here comes a letter from Sr. N—, away in the west, all in a hurry and almost out of breath:—

"B—, Ill., Nov. 13, '61.

* * * Yesterday I visited the National Hospital, and now I wish to tell you what I want,—it is this: all the tracts you can spare for the soldiers. Don't throw away so many in those case-hardened, preached-to-death parts, the soldiers are so hungry for reading. They seem especially pleased with religious books. Here is an immense field for me to work in. The Lord has opened the doors of friends in St. Louis so that I can be boarded free, and my fare paid to St. Louis. [illegible]

There are hundreds, yes thousands of poor sick and wounded men there. [illegible]

[illegible] while I talked with them.
[illegible] part of that lovely hymn
"There is a better world they say!"
When I came to the last verse:

"This world is all so dark and drear,
Take us there.
We never can be happy here,
But take us there.
O listen to that music sweet,
It comes so rich from yonder seat,
Where all the good in glory meet!
Take us there!"

they earnestly promised through their tears they'd strive for that better world. Now I know your kind heart, but tell the brethren to help you. It is a rare opportunity and should not be lost. Send such tracts as those sets of 'Important Questions,'—send such as you know will be appropriate, and put in the bundle your prayers and good wishes. A Baptist preacher in St. Louis told me that I could do more good there than all the Clergy in the city. They will hear a woman when they wont a fashionable clergyman. We can but sow the seed and leave the effects with God. They would say, 'When will you come again?' Sometimes I would find good christians there. But I must close. Send me some as soon as you can. I have a little money now, so I can pay postage. It is only a little, but when that is gone may be I'll have more. Your sister. E.

P. S. Put in one of Bro. Berick's Disquisitions on the Prophecies for me. I will pay you for the tracts sometime, if possible, but we often do not have five cents!"

Well, Sister, I have to-day sent you about eighty-four hundred pages of tracts, mostly practical Gospel tracts. Olive leaves, Important Questions, Gems, &c., &c., with others on prophetical subjects, in three packages, by mail. I also send you Bro. Berick's pamphlet, the last one I have, and another pamphlet of my own, free. The tracts are mostly four page tracts, so there are some 15 or 1800 of them. I am glad to send them freely from the tract fund, and I would to God that others might feel the importance of the work, and give freely of their perishing wealth to spread the word of God. But worldly men generally like to get all they can and keep what they have, till war, providence, or death sweeps it all away. I will try however to furnish you what tracts you may need, and I have no doubt that the Lord will provide means to replace them. His bounty doesn't fail in hard times, and his throne doesn't rest on "cotton." Use these tracts up and send for more.

While upon this subject, I may say that a few months since I met my friend Elder D—, now chaplain of the Volunteer hospital at Fortress Monroe, Va.; and he told me how much suffering he came in contact with, and how much the sick and wounded soldiers wanted reading matter, and said anything I could send to him, free of expense, would be thankfully received. A brother in R. I. solicited and obtained lately several thousand pages of tracts for soldiers going from his vicinity, and I have besides personally distributed many tracts among soldiers at my own expense. I cannot engage in the bloody scenes of conflict, but I will do all I can to save soldiers, as I would to save others. I have dear friends whose torn and mangled bodies lie beneath the fresh-piled earth of southern battle-fields,—there are others that I love, now sickened of the dreadful work, and yet bound to remain and do a soldier's grievous duty. Yes, and my only brother, (O pray for him!) is now an inmate in some western camp.

Amid these scenes of sorrow and of blood, men become sometimes sobered and reflecting. Then, too, when on the couch of distress and pain, they long for sympathy, and for some mental occupation. I will do what I can for them there. I am cheered in the work of Tract distribution by the results I see from time to time. Last summer I think it was, I gave to Bro. G—, who commands a trading vessel, a package of tracts from the Tract fund. Sunday he came into meeting, and at night, while at my house, related that he gave most of them away at Grenada, (one of the British West India Islands, containing about 5000 whites and 27,000 blacks). He said the colored people crowded around, eager to get the tracts, especially such as referred to the blessed hope, and the coming Kingdom of God. He gave them freely and left them rejoicing in the Lord.

A lady told me recently that a relative, the commander of a trading vessel, whom she had furnished with my tracts and with papers, &c., had read them to his ship's crew on Sundays in the place of preaching, and had scattered them in the East Indies, in Calcutta, and in various places where he had touched. I am to send him more as soon as opportunity offers.

In this way, I go on. I have interesting letters from a person in Scotland to whom packages of publications have been sent, and many other letters from various sources, which I have thought ought to have been read by all the readers of the Crisis long ago. If I am allowed the privilege, I may sometime present extracts from some of them, if time and health permit.

Well, I have to-day sent off twelve thousand pages of tracts by mail; a pile about two feet high,—most of them for the soldiers. Three more such days works would, I believe, exhaust the treasury of the "Tract Fund for the West." What then shall I do? Shall I stop? No, not while so much is to be done, and so few are ready to do it. I have been made to think that my appeals were not agreeably received by some, and I feel reluctant to persist in them. Such, I hope, if the friends will [illegible] fully to the work, that the "Christian Publication Society" will be something more than a Crisis Society. Will not the brethren at once raise the $500 needed and called for to inaugurate the work in earnest? But I cannot stop so long as tracts are so much in demand, and I have them, and they can be had at present no where else. I shall continue to send them out. Lately I had a call from a camp in Kentucky for Tracts. I sent twenty-four hundred pages to be scattered among the soldiers there. What are they among so many? I have, however, not only nearly exhausted the Tract Fund, but my stock of Tracts is quite low. Books I have, but cannot sell them and so use the money." I have, however, some paper in New York, purchased some time ago to fill an order for tracts given by the Christian Publication Society and which was after countermanded or changed. This paper will make two or three hundred thousand pages of Tracts, and I think I shall soon work it up if the way opens to do so, and shall set them flying with or without price. I shall be glad to sell to those who wish to buy, either books or tracts, and I shall still "give to him that asketh and from him that would borrow turn not away," as long as they last, and when they are gone I hope to have a few more of the same sort.

If any wish to have Tracts sent to their soldier friends in camp, or to their friends elsewhere, I will send them tracts free, or at the rate of 1200 pages (or 800 four page Tracts) for one dollar, post paid. I will also furnish any of my books for soldiers or the poor at half price, when ordered of me, provided the postage (usually about one sixth of the price of the book) is paid, and the money sent with the order. All my agents may sell my books to soldiers and the poor at that rate, and I will allow them the difference between that and the cost, when they settle their accounts, if they will report the number sold and the persons who buy them. Orders on these terms should be sent to me, as the Crisis office cannot afford to sell them at these rates.

In conclusion let me say, be diligent. Our times are grandly important. In the redness of the furnace glow, God moulds the destiny of nations and of men, some to honor and some to dishonor:—the vessels of mercy he prepares for glory, and the vessels of wrath he fits for destruction. And now, as of old, he chooseth his people in the furnace of affliction. Coming troubles cast their shadows before us, and vast events loom grandly up upon our eager gaze. Let us then labor to serve our generation by the will of God. O for His might wherewith we may be girded for now, and great, and holy labors in his service. From the heights of heaven there rings the solemn charge of the Captain of our salvation,—that Commander who never lost a battle, and the waving of whose standard is but the omen of victory:—"WATCH YE: STAND FAST IN THE FAITH: QUIT YOU LIKE MEN. BE STRONG." Let us heed the mandate.

OBITUARY NOTICES.—Would they not be far more likely to be read if they were shorter? Would it not be better for the writers to condense? How often we see a needlessly long article on the death of a child. Let us study wisdom.

W. SHELDON.

Obituary Notices.

Fell asleep, Oct. 26th, of pleurisy and lung fever, on Stillwell Prairie, Ind., STEPHEN WINCHELL, at the residence of his son, N. J. Winchell, aged 73 years.

A father in Israel has fallen. We shall see his face no more in this world, but hope the time is not long until we shall see him and our mother again in the glorified state. My prayer is that we may meet together with them where parting is no more.

R. TAYLOR.

Died, in North Rochester, of diphtheria, Oct. 31st, SUSAN ANNETTE, aged eight years, eight months and sixteen days. Also, Nov. 13th, JUSTINA M., aged ten years, nine months and three days, only daughters of Benj. E. and Susan H. Horr.

Death, the cruel enemy,
Removed them from our gaze;
No more we'll hear their joyous tones,
Mingling in songs of praise.
We may not hear their fervent prayer,
Nor with them bend the knee;
Yet know in endless life they'll share,
And reign eternally.

Dear Nettie sleeps, she who was wont
Her parents' hearts to cheer;
And Tinnie, who to loving ones
Had ever proved so dear..
But we look forward to the day
That soon will greet our eyes,
When Christ the Sun of Righteousness
With healing shall arise
To banish death and all our woe,
And cause earth's strife to cease;
O may we with them, gathered home,
Enjoy eternal peace.

P. A. GIFFORD.

New Bedford, Nov. 17th. 1861.

Sweetly fell asleep, in Jesus, on Tuesday, Nov. 19th, of consumption, Sister SAMANTHA BERRY, eldest child of Bro. Freeman and Sr. Amanda Berry, of Shefford, C. E., aged 27 years.

It pleased God, some four or five years in the past, to call the attention of Bro. Berry's family to the [illegible] of the soon coming of the King of Kings, and they commenced to [illegible] their house in order. [illegible] the parents and three of the daughters put on Christ by baptism. Since then, their humble dwelling has been the pilgrim's home. Upon them has devolved, and still does, much of the burden of sustaining the Advent cause in that part of the town; and even now, in their be- [illegible] movement, they may be seen to smile through their gushing tears, as their faith takes hold on Him who holds the keys of hell and death in his hands, to say to the prisoner, go forth, and to the angels, gather together mine elect; let them come where I am, that they may see my glory; bring them to share my triumph in a world where none can die.

The funeral was attended by our dearly beloved Bro. Hutchinson. Text, "And God shall wipe all tears from their eyes." Though feeble in health, yet holy eloquence falling from his lips, in dispensing divine truth, cheered and consoled our stricken hearts, as we wept our loved one gone.

Lawrenceville, Nov. 29th, '61.

Died, in Brimfield, Nov. 23d, 1861, Bro. TIMOTHY H. DODGE, aged 50 years.

Bro. Dodge has been a great sufferer for many years, but has borne with christian fortitude and resignation all the evils incident to feeble health. Though it would not have been surprising to have heard of his death at almost any time, for fifteen years, still, when it came, it was sudden and indeed unexpected. He had worked on the bench even to the day of his death. His hope of future life did not fail him in the trying hour. His son, upon whom he had depended much to aid in the support of his family, has been prostrate by sickness several years; still, by the unyielding energy of Sr. Dodge, and the substantial kindness of neighbors, they have not failed of a comfortable support. Sr. Dodge requests the prayers of the church in this hour of trial. We talked to the people, first from Ps. 103. 14, "He remembereth that we are dust"; and from Acts 26: 8, "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead"? And we indeed felt "the resurrection near."

DOMESTIC NEWS.

Washington, Nov. 26. The Assistant Secretary of War has received a despatch from Baltimore stating that the Norfolk Day Book publishes advices from Richmond to the effect that an engagement was going on at Pensacola. Parties who read the paper say it states that the frigates Niagara and Colorado engaged Fort McRae, and that the fort briskly returned the fire; and further, that the vessels being damaged, were compelled to haul off. The Day Book adds that Fort Pickens was firing on the Pensacola Navy yard. Another dispatch says that the fight commenced Saturday, and was in progress Sunday night.

Fort Pickens, by firing hot shot, had set the Pensacola Navy Yard on fire three times, but the rebels managed up to the latter day to extinguish the flames. They had not, however, been able to suppress those of the burning town of Warrington, which the hot shot had utterly destroyed. It was thought at Old Point that our victory is decisive.

Baltimore, Nov. 28. The secession reports say the affair at Fort Pickens occurred on the 19th.

New York, Nov. 26. The Herald's Washington dispatch says that West, the deserter from the rebel army, reports that the rebel force about Centreville, where the headquarters are established, numbers 60,000 men, and as many more along the Potomac lines. Centreville is well defended, [illegible]. At Manassas, however, there are [illegible] heavy guns. He describes [illegible] good spirits, and pretty well [illegible] armed, and under the [illegible] war is one of subjugation, devastation and abolition. This impression they receive from their officers and chaplains.

It is the intention of the government to put all the coast defences of the Northern States into complete working order immediately. The Governors of the States are authorized to carry out the work.

Information has been received to-day from rebel forces, of the intention of the enemy to burn Hunter's Mills.

The privateer Beauregard, of Charleston, with 27 men and one large pivot gun, was captured by gunboat W. G. Anderson of Boston, now lying at Key West.

New York, Nov. 28. A Fortress Monroe letter says the rebels lost fifteen killed and wounded in the shelling of their camp at Warwick.

The Richmond Dispatch reports 3000 Unionists in the mountains of East Tennessee, under Parson Brownlow and Major Gilham, who are doing more mischief than the Yankees in Kentucky.

The Dispatch proposes to abandon Norfolk in the event of an attack, and begs reinforcements of Richmond, City Point and Yorktown.

Thirty thousand troops are expected at Fortress Monroe. An order was read to those there Monday that they are not to be furnished with winter quarters. This seems to indicate an advance.

It is announced that the stone blockading fleet is for the destruction of Charleston harbor.

The ship John L Dimmick has arrived from Liverpool with thirteen rifled cannon for the Government, including a 100 pounder carrying five miles. The latter goes to Fortress Monroe.

New York, Nov. 28. The Times dispatch states it is currently reported that Jeff Davis has appointed Breckinridge and Hunter to succeed Slidell and Mason, and they are to make their way secretly to Quebec or Halifax and thence to Europe.

Advices from Winchester state that Jackson, the rebel General, is engaged in drilling a regiment of slaves to fight against the Federal troops.

New York, Nov. 29. General Fremont arrived here last night.

Letters from Port Royal report that an expedition left on the 24th inst. for St. Helena Inlet, and, without striking a blow, took the enemy's works. The guns had been carried inland.

The Tribune's Washington dispatch says Adj. Gen. Thomas has sent instructions to Gen. Sherman, at Port Royal, to seize all the cotton, corn, rice and crops of various sorts within his reach, and to use what is necessary and of value for subsistence to his troops, and to send the cotton to New York, to be sold for the benefit of the Government. Gen. Sherman is also directed to take the services of negroes not only to aid in gathering crops, but also in making fortifications.

The Philadelphia Inquirer's says there was no breach made in Fort Pickens. Great excitement prevailed in the South about the battle, but it was thought Bragg would be able to force Col. Brown to surrender.

A messenger arrived from Pensacola on Sunday last, with a peremptory order for reinforcements. Bragg would then be hopeful of an early success, and was replying at intervals upon the fortress with great effect. His regular salvo is described as terrible. He expected to make a breach by Monday, when reinforcements would storm it with fresh troops and ordnance.

Colonel Brown had concentrated a perfect storm of hot shot and shell upon the Navy Yard, and it had been burnt down, with all the outbuildings, and a considerable amount of army and ordnance stores destroyed.

Pensacola had been evacuated by order of Bragg.

Col. Brown called to his assistance five vessels of war, all of which had been driven off by the batteries. The Niagara was almost riddled with balls and the Colorado thoroughly disabled. Bragg declared to his troops that he would never surrender alive, and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed among his men. On Tuesday Bragg would engage Col. Brown in front, and land a large force on the island to take him in the rear.

It is generally believed that Bragg has been whipped, Pensacola burned, and probably Bragg's whole force captured.

A Quebec letter to the Times says that at a council of war it was determined to prepare for emergencies by placing the Canadian frontier in a state of defence. There were rumors that it had been resolved upon to call out 10,000 volunteers, but nothing authentic.

Philadelphia, Nov. 29. The Inquirer's Fortress Monroe letter states that the rebel reports say that Pensacola had been evacuated, and that the Navy Yard was entirely destroyed by Fort Pickens.

Washington, Nov. 29th. Commodore Dupont reports that Fort Pulaski is at the mercy of our forces the moment the latter desire to take it. Also that reliable accounts informed him that Savannah was being evacuated by the people as fast as possible, fearing, probably, that Commodore Rogers would attempt to take it. He further states that Commodore Tatnall, of the rebel fleet, had given it as his opinion that the entire rebel defences of the Southern coast must be abandoned, as they could not stand the armament of our fleet.

Baltimore, 30th. A Richmond despatch contains telegrams from Augusta, which are dated 26th, announcing the taking possession of Tybee Island, and one dated 27th, says Com. Tatnall, with his fleet, have gone down to drive the Hessians off.

New York, 30th. The Tribune's special Washington despatch says that Government received intelligence yesterday that the leaders of the rebellion in Richmond and in the rebel camps across the Potomac, at last are satisfied that they are to be beaten in the issue of arms which they have made, and that the cause of secession is a hopeless one.

New York, Dec. 2. A spy has just returned from Richmond and says that intense excitement exists throughout the entire South, by reason of our naval expeditions. The rebel troops from the threatened States declare they will go home, and large numbers have already started.

ITEMS.

PERSONAL. It is found that John Slidell, the rebel commissioner now at Fort Warren, is the proprietor of twenty-five thousand acres of land in Minnesota. The property will probably be confiscated by the government.

GREAT EXPEDITION. Our readers will perceive by the new railroad schedules published to-day that, actuated by a public spirit which gives them fresh claims to the grateful consideration of the entire community, the several railroad companies on the seaboard line have united in adopting a rate of speed on their respective roads which actually reduces the time of travel between Washington and Boston within twenty hours! Thus a person leaving Boston at 2 P. M. arrives at Washington at 9 1-2 o'clock next morning.

"THESSALONICA; OR, THE MODEL CHURCH."—A good work. Let it be widely circulated. It breathes the right kind of a spirit. Let our western friends send for this little volume, and scatter it among their neighbors. It will interest and benefit both you and them.

A Call for Funds.

The publishing committee of the CHRISTIAN PUBLICATION SOCIETY, deeply sensible of the fact that the time is short, and that our work must be done soon, or not at all, venture this appeal to those interested in disseminating divine truth through the press.

We purpose to commence at once the publication of Tracts upon important Scriptural topics, of vital interest to the church of God in these times of peril and dismay. We wish to present to the household of faith "meat in due season." We wish to scatter light among the benighted of the earth, and to sound out the word of the Lord.

To do this on a scale answering at all to immediate necessities, we propose to raise at once FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS, ($500) by special contributions, for this object. This money is designed to obtain and publish tracts, new and old, adapted to the times in which we live. We who engage in the work as publishing committee have no salaries or pay whatever for our services, and we mean that every dollar contributed shall tell in the great work. Each tract will be submitted to the careful examination and judgment of our Editorial Committee, H. L. Hastings, H. F. Carpenter and D. T. Taylor, in whose judgment, ability and prudence the churches can safely confide. Only such tracts as they shall approve will be published by the Society. We expect to furnish tracts cheaper than ANY TRACT SOCIETY in the COUNTRY, and our surplus, beyond the actual expenses of issuing them, will be devoted to the purpose of furnishing tracts for gratuitous circulation, or wherever they may be needed.

Brethren, will you help us in this work? Will you give us money? Or will you send us $100, $50, $20, or $10, to be repaid in TRACTS, at cheap rates, when you shall choose to order them? We wish this work to move on at once. We therefore call for $500, and pledge ourselves to see it used in a manner that shall tend to accomplish the desired object. We do not wish to divert the funds of the World's Crisis for this work, nor has its treasury sufficient money that can be spared for this purpose. We call upon all interested in publishing and scattering cheap Tracts, to contribute for this object. Will not preachers take hold of it? Will not churches make collections and remit them?

No fear need be entertained that the work will be delayed. As soon as a portion of it is raised, and tracts are prepared, it can begin, and each dollar added will facilitate the object and extend the operations of the society. Come, then, to the work. Send us donations, pledges, or loans, to be repaid in publications, in amounts from a hundred dollars to a widow's mite; and with them let your prayers ascend, that God's blessing may attend our efforts and crown them with success. Monies should be sent to Miles Grant, Editor of the World's Crisis, Boston, Mass.

For the Crisis.

I'm looking for Jesus.

BY [illegible].

I'm looking for Jesus, my Savior and King,
To change this vile body and cause me to sing,
Where life's crystal river eternally glides,
And the evergreen verdure grows up by its side.
Then roll, roll away,
Old Time, hasten through,
And bring me, dear Savior,
To joys ever new.

I'm hoping in Jesus, that soon I shall see
A world bathed in glory, a soil that is free,
Where the toil-worn and weary forever shall sing
Loud anthems of praises to Jesus our King!

I'm waiting for Jesus, who soon will appear
To awaken my kindred that I love so dear,
And give us a home with the pure and the blest,
In the realms of fair Canaan, forever to rest.

I'm longing for Jesus to end this rude strife,
Which oft makes me sad, and embitters my life;
I weep over follies, the pathway I tread,
O'er hopes often blasted, and friends that are dead.

I'm sighing for Jesus; old earth has grown drear;
And wait for the hour when he shall appear
To make it his home, all beauteous and fair;
I long to behold it, I sigh to be there.

Church Ordinances.

(Concluded.)

The "fellowship" or "distributing to the necessity of saints," Rom. 12 : 13, is another duty, in the practice of which the first christians "steadfastly continued," (Acts 2 : 42); thus proving the sincerity of their profession of mutual holy affection. "For to their power, I bear record, yea and beyond their power, they were willing of themselves praying us with much entreaty, that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints." 2 Cor. 8 : 3, 4. See also 2 Cor. 9 : 9–13, Rom. 15 : 25, 26, Heb. 13 : 16. The same Greek word is in these passages translated "fellowship," "contribution," "distribution," and "to communicate." These contributions of heaven-born charity were evidently voluntary. Their property was never all put into one common stock. This is manifest from the above passages, and also from the apostle's words to Ananias. Acts 5 : 4. See also 1 Tim. 5 : 4, 8, 10, 16. They had too much precious experience of the verity of the Savior's words, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive," to leave their poor brethren to the cold charity of a covetous world. Alas! reader, what a direful record of idolatrous covetousness, will be found against the modern professed christian church, when the books of the last judgment shall be opened! "Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

As the true christian church is a holy communion, "the pillar and ground of the truth," the faithful observance of the ordinance of DISCIPLINE is absolutely essential to its true character. As "the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God," (1 Cor. 6 : 9) they have no right to membership in the church. "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? . . . Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." 2 Cor. 6 : 14–18. As none but the spiritual are qualified to offer the spiritual sacrifices, for which holy purpose the "lively stones are built up a spiritual house," (1 Pet 2 : 5) there can be no greater incongruity than the admission of the spiritually dead to this sacred fraternity, or their retention when their true character is manifested. In respect to private offences, our blessed Master's rule in Matt. 18 is of incalculable importance. Alas! my brethren, what sad consequences have resulted from disregarding it! "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother." Who that knows anything of human nature, can fail to perceive the wisdom of this direction? What a barrier to repentance and reconciliation is the practice of telling a private offence to others, instead of going to the offender in the spirit of love and meekness to settle it before it is known to a third person. Might not some wretched souls have been saved from continued impenitence and everlasting death, had this excellent command been obeyed? Has not Jesus Christ been dishonored in the house of his friends, by their faults coming to the knowledge of an ungodly world, which ought never to have been known but by two persons? "If he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established." This second effort for a righteous adjustment, when the first is unsuccessful, is to be made without telling the fault to any but the two or three. With them, and with the parties, it is to remain, if a reconciliation can be effected. "If he shall neglect to hear them, tell it to the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be to thee as an heathen man and a publican." [illegible] For the honor of our holy reli- [illegible] manded at once to reprove publicly. "Them that (thus) sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear." 1 Tim. 5 : 20. In all cases where offences are publicly known, public discipline is requisite, to manifest that the church of the living God has "no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness." The apostle instructed the Corinthian church to put away the incestuous person when they were gathered together, which we are certainly to understand as referring to their stated meeting on the first day of the week, (Acts 20 : 7); from which we know, by 1 Cor. 14 : 23, that unbelievers were not excluded. We learn from the apostle's direction to the Corinthian church (2 Cor. 2 : 6–8) the duty of forgiving and receiving to our fellowship all penitent offenders. Our divine Master solemnly assures us, that if we do not, from the heart, forgive our brethren their trespasses, neither will our heavenly Father forgive us. Matt. 18 : 35.

Although it is the duty and privilege of the lowest plurality of immersed believers to come together on the first day of the week to break bread (Acts 20 : 7), to exhort one another after reading the Scriptures (Heb. 10 : 25), and to sing and pray with the spirit and the understanding (1 Cor. 14 : 15), the appointment or ordaining of ELDERS and DEACONS, as soon as circumstances will admit, is a plain scriptural duty. "And when they had ordained (kirotonesantes, chosen with lifting of hands; i. e., of the church) elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord," &c. Acts 14 : 23. Paul directed Titus to "ordain ELDERS in every city, . . . if any be blameless. . . . for a BISHOP must be blameless," &c. Titus 1 : 5–7. This passage plainly proves that the terms Elder and Bishop are descriptive of the same office. Their qualifications for their duties to teach and rule, not "as being lords over God's heritage, but as being ensamples to the flock," (1 Pet. 5 : 1–3) are described, with the requisite qualifications of the deacons. 1 Tim. 3, Heb. 13 : 17.

It is the plainly revealed duty of the churches to communicate of their carnal things according to their ability, to those who minister to them in spiritual things. See 1 Cor. 9 : 7–14. The Lord hath "ordained that they that preach the gospel should live of the gospel," ver. 14; nor is this to be considered a matter of charity, for "the laborer is worthy of his reward." 1 Tim. 5 : 18.

In some circumstances, it may be the duty of Elders to labor with their own hands, as the apostle directed the Ephesian elders to do, in imitation of his own example. Acts 20 : 34, 35. It is however for the spiritual benefit of the church, that "those who labor in the word and doctrine" should "give (themselves) wholly to" their official work. 1 Tim. 4 : 15. This official work is not legislative. Jesus Christ is the only Lawgiver in his church. It is their duty to teach all things which he has commanded without addition or diminution, "watching for souls" and for the edification of the church in truth and holiness, "as they which must give account, that they may do it with joy and not with grief." Heb. 13 : 17. The faithful are to be highly esteemed in love for their work's sake. 1 Thess. 5 : 13.

My beloved christian brethren, it is a prevalent device of the Adversary to turn away the disciples of Jesus Christ from keeping his commandments, by persuading them that our modes of worship and observance of divine ordinances are unimportant, if our hearts are right with God. Alas! how have the commandments of the Lord been made void by the traditions of men! The wisdom which substitutes these traditions for the laws of Jesus Christ, "is foolishness with God." Verily, if our hearts are with God as they ought to be, we shall "have respect to ALL his commandments." Then shall we "not be ashamed before him" at the coming of our Lord. Let us "not think that he has commanded a trifle, or presume to trifle with what he has commanded."

The opposite error is another device of the Adversary to sever the body of Christ. It is highly important to avoid making either more or less essential to christian fellowship in the church than the Head of the church has required. The law of forbearing love in the family of the redeemed, in the present state, is a command of no ordinary importance. It is essential to the unity of the "ONE BODY." The command to receive all that are "in the faith" of Jesus Christ, though "weak," or erroneous, in respect to some things, is plain and imperative. See Rom. 14 : 1, 15 : 7; compare 1 Cor. 8 : 7. "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus." Gal. 3 : 26. As holy faith brings us into this sacred relationship, it consequently entitles us to its privileges. This faith is indeed "with the heart unto righteousness," working by love, which is keeping the commandments of God. A holy desire and determination to keep all the known commandments of the Lord, is indeed essential to this faith and love; but an actual knowledge of all is not essential. We now "know in part and prophesy in part." O how displeasing it must be to Jesus Christ, who bears with so much ignorance and imperfection in us, to behold us violating his law of forbearing love toward one another! Finally, my brethren, "put on charity (or love) which is the bond of perfectness." HOLY LOVE. PRACTICAL LOVE. This is the vital element of the religion which saves us from everlasting death. There is no substitute for it. Without this we perish forever. It constitutes the joy of heaven, and will constitute the joy and blessedness of the kingdom of heaven, in the new earth, where righteousness and peace shall forever dwell. How manifest then it is, that no knowledge, or faith, or sectarian zeal, or hope, or forms of godliness, can, without this vital principle, prepare us for that blest abode.

God grant, dear brethren, that this blessed, holy love may influence all our actions and reign in us now and forever. Your fellow servant in the gospel of "Jesus Christ, to whom be glory forever. Amen."

The Peace of God.

O for that light to fall upon my way,
Which tells of sins forgiven, and pardon sealed;
O for that foregleam of eternal day,
Which comes to those whom Gilead's balm hath healed.

Weary of tossing, by rude passions driven;
Weary of smarting 'neath affliction's rod;
Yearning to know the harmonies of heaven,
My longing heart cries for "the peace of God."

Nothing that earth hath promised or bestowed,
Nought that I find in devious paths long trod;
Nothing foreshown in hopes that brightly glowed,
Can calm my longings for "the peace of God."

Father of mercies, Savior full of grace,
Bringer of peace through thine own cleansing blood,
Spurn not a sinner who would seek thy face,
O give my trembling heart "the peace of God."

Spirit divine, whose fruits are joy and peace,
Come to my heart and make it thine abode;
Make me to taste the joys that never cease,
O calm my spirit with "the peace of God."

Grant me, oh Father, when earth's toils are o'er,
When all thy pilgrims shall have passed the flood,
Low at thy throne to worship and adore,
Sharing the deep and endless "peace of God."

Indifference.

The Devil admires her votaries. He not only knows that the active existence of this principle is a destroying evil, but through its epidemic influence is laid the foundation of his kingdom. He never taxes his ingenuity in this direction, for he knows the moral leprosy warrants him a spontaneous harvest. And the sinner, who so steels his heart against the pleadings of Jesus,—who, by his stoical indifference, spurns with loathing his sceptre of mercy and forbearance,—that individual is not only accessory to the promotion of evil, but subscribes to the death of the "Son of God," while practically he is a stronghold of Satan's operations. His false fancies of security are but the syren song of the serpent, which weaves the winding-sheet of souls, and lays them in the urn of everlasting death.

But there will come a time when human greatness shall be lost in the general wreck of nature; there will come a time when the briefly gathered spoils of life will appear as the "small dust in the balance," and as frail as the dying zephyr; there will come a time when man's earthly hopes will seem as distant as the far-off planets, and cold as the frozen ocean; and there will come a time when the rehearsal of his misspent life will flash across his vision like the lurid lightning's gleam, as he reads, in letters of living light, the preface of his doom: "As ye have sown, so shall ye reap this day."

What will be the lie of a life-time profit, when Christ shall judge the secrets of men's hearts? What would man give for a fragment of time to wipe out the foul blot that sears his soul with fire as he gazes on the radiance of that temple which shelters the happy bands of the redeemed?

It is not enough that we are happy; but to make others happy, is the golden chain which links our hearts with Christ's. It is not enough that we expect to be inducted into our Savior's presence when earth shall be made glad by his visitation; but to look upon some saved soul, the result of our integrity to Him, and to sit and eat with them at his table in his kingdom, is the graceful garniture which clothes His people with spotless righteousness. O, I wait with unimpaired prospect that sanctified hour which shall seal our redemption, and gather His waiting ones to that immortal banquet.

"One sweetly solemn thought
Comes to me o'er and o'er:
I'm nearer my home to-day
Than I've ever been before;
Nearer my Father's house,
Where the many mansions be,
Nearer the great white throne,
Near the jasper sea;
Nearer that bound of life
Where we lay our burdens down,
Nearer leaving the cross,
Nearer wearing the crown."

Blackstone, Mass. C. G. CARRE.

The Sign.

Where are we in the history of the signs of the Lord's coming, or what signs have been fulfilled, and what are to be fulfilled? —In considering this subject I intend to take up the signs as recorded in the Gospels by Matthew, Mark and Luke. In Matt. 24 : 29, we read that immediately after the tribulation of certain days the sun should be darkened, and I understand that it was the first sign of the Lord's coming, and it was fulfilled May 19th, 1780. The second sign, which is the moon's refusing to give her light, according to history and a few living witnesses, was fulfilled the night following May 19th, 1780. The third sign, stars falling from heaven, was fulfilled according to historians, and a great many living witnesses, Nov. 13th, 1833. According to Matthew, the next sign to be fulfilled is the shaking of the powers of heaven, and as some expositors think that it has been fulfilled in the shaking of the governments of earth, I wish to say that Mark records it like the following. "And the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken." Now if the powers that are in heaven are meant, the sign cannot be fulfilled in the governments of earth; and I believe that it is not, but is to be fulfilled in the future. What the powers are I am not prepared to say; but according to Luke's gospel, in his 21st chapter, the signs to be fulfilled after the sign in the stars, are upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity; the sea and the waves roaring; men's heart's failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth." I believe these signs have been, are now, and some will be still fulfilled in the future. The fourth sign, as recorded in Matt. and Mark, Luke gives as follows, after those of which I have just spoken: "For the powers of heaven shall be shaken." It seems according to this, it is to be fulfilled; and my opinion is that it will be a shaking that will cause those who witness it to think that the judgment day is coming, more than the darkening of the sun did those who witnessed that sign.

The next sign to be fulfilled, according to Matthew, is the sign of the Son of man in heaven. This is to be in the future; "and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." Mark records it the same; and so I think that we can see where we are in the stream of time. Is it not plain that we are to witness but one or two signs more at most, before we shall see that same Jesus that went away in the clouds of heaven come again in like manner? Seeing we look for such things, what manner of persons ought we to "be in all holy conversation and godliness."

A few words of what he said to his disciples, and I will close. "And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh." Dear reader, remember that it is when we begin to see these things, not after they have all been fulfilled; for then we are to know that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. What must we do that it come not upon us unawares? We must take heed that our hearts be not over-charged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life. We are to watch and pray always, that we may not be taken in a snare. Yours for truth.

Translation and Explication.

In the Crisis, dated Oct. 23d, an inquiry was made for Prof. Bush's translation of Dan. 12 : 2. We responded as follows: "In his work on the Resurrection, the Prof. gives an extended, able, and exhaustive analysis of the text in question. After demonstrating the impropriety of our present translation, he says: "As the result of the whole, then, we give the following as the correct explication of the passage, which will at once afford an answer to the objection that the same thing—viz., awaking—is predicated of both classes:

'And many of the sleepers of the dust shall awake; these (the awakened) (shall be) to everlasting life; those (the unawakened) (shall be) to shame and everlasting contempt.' "

In the above rendering of the text, we have a translation and an explication. The translation is embodied in twenty-one words, exclusive of those in brackets. It appears to be conceded that if Prof. Bush gives the translation of a passage, his authority is very good. In the above we have his translation. The very fact that the Prof. bracketed his own words, shows that he intended the rest to be a literal version. The guarded words are eight in number, and were inserted by the Prof. (not to help his doctrinal views, which they do not, but) to give the precise signification of the original Hebrew,—or, as he says, "the correct explication of the passage."

Prof. Bush never denied a resurrection. He never denied that the text teaches a resurrection. To be sure, he believed the awaking alluded to in the text is a spiritual awaking; but he never denied that it teaches an awaking. Thus the Prof. and the readers of the Crisis perfectly agree in subscribing the fact of an awaking. If we are correct in our statements, any candid person must admit that the Professor's peculiar opinions do not invalidate his criticism on the Hebrew text. We will now let the Prof. speak for himself.

"The following may serve as a literal version. 'And many of the sleepers of the dust of the ground shall awake—these to everlasting life, and those to shame and everlasting contempt.' But this still comes short of presenting to the English reader the precise shade of meaning conveyed by the words, as it does [illegible] express the true nature of the [illegible] in the lot of the [illegible] by the original. According to the established rendering both classes awake, and this distinction is consequent upon their awaking. The one class awakes to life and honor, the other to shame and dishonor. It is greatly to be questioned whether this is sustained by the true construction of the Hebrew. That, we believe, makes the distinction to consist in the lot of those who awake to life, and those who do not awake at all. In the outset all are represented as sleeping: out of these all, a portion (Raveem, many) awake; the rest remain unawakened."

The Prof. then goes on to give the grounds of his construction. We withhold the argument for the sake of brevity. But to us it is conclusive. His reasoning from beginning to end is purely philological, and not doctrinal. He sums up in the language transcribed at the commencement of this article. He inserts the eight words, in brackets, not to teach his doctrine, but as necessary to an understanding of the precise meaning of the original Hebrew. Thus we have the unbiased testimony, not of Bush the Swedenborgian, as some suppose, but of Bush, the Hebraist.

The Granary.

A TALE WHICH EVERY PERSON WILL READ.

By one who has been an Editor.

"Whoso readeth let him understand."

"Jonathan Homespun, having purchased an extensive farm, and provided himself with everything requisite for prosperous husbandry, proposes to furnish subscribers with one quart of wheat weekly, at the low price of two dollars in advance, or at two dollars and fifty cents, if paid after six weeks.

The facilities afforded by the government for the transportation of wheat to every section of the country and adjacent provinces, are such as must prove satisfactory to every subscriber; and the proprietor of the Granary assures all who may patronize him, that he will exert himself to supply an article of the first quality. N. B.—Agents will be allowed a generous per-centage. Address, postpaid, Proprietor of the Granary, Hopewell."

Such was the prospectus issued by my friend, Mr. Homespun. Feeling a lively interest in his welfare, I visited his farm, although it was a long journey from my home, and was pleased to find everything in nice order. He informed me that he had contracted a large debt in the purchase of the premises, stock, and implements of husbandry, but he had no doubt of his ability to discharge every obligation in a few years. He also stated that he had already received many hundred subscribers, and that in four or five weeks he would commence the delivery of the wheat according to proposal.

The scheme appeared plausible, and my friend was so confident of success, that I had not the slightest doubt of his prosperity. I entered my name as a subscriber, and when I left him, he was preparing many thousand quart sacks.

Every week for the space of two years, I received my quart of wheat, and concluded, from its excellent quality and prompt delivery, that everything was prosperous with Jonathan Homespun and his farm. So I gave myself no concern about my indebtedness to him; "for," said I "to a farmer so extensively patronized as he is, the small pittance of two years' arrearages would be but a drop in the bucket." It is true, there was occasionally printed on the sacks a general notice to delinquents; but I never suspected that this was intended for his friends.

The notice, however, became more frequent, and having leisure, I concluded that I would visit my friend, the proprietor of the Granary. He greeted me cordially, but I saw there had been trouble. He was evidently worn with toil and anxiety, and in the conversation of the evening, he entered into particulars.

"Here have I been laboring, day and almost night, for two years; and I am more in debt now than when I began. My creditors are pressing for payment, and I am conscious of inability to meet their demands, and can perceive no result but bankruptcy and ruin."

"But have not you a very large list of subscribers?" inquired I.

"Yes, a very large list," was the reply, "but too many of them are like you."

"Me!" I quickly rejoined, in amazement; too many like me?"

"Pardon me," said my friend, in a melancholy tone; "pardon me, for oppression will make even a wise man mad. You have had a quart of wheat weekly for two years, and I have not received a cent of payment. I have a large list of the same kind of patrons, scattered here and there over thousands of miles. If they would pay me the trifles they severally owe, I should be directly freed from embarassment, and go on my way rejoicing. But they reasoned as you reason; and among you I am brought to the door of poverty and ruin."

I felt the force of the rebuke, and promptly paid arrearages at the increased prices named in the prospectus, and also a year in advance. I bid adieu to the worthy and wronged farmer, resolving to do everything in my power to repair the injury which had accrued from my delinquency.

O ye patrons of Jonathan Homespun! wherever ye are, or whoever you are, ye have received and eaten the wheat from his Granary without making payment. Ye are guilty of a grievous sin of omission. Therefore repent. Pay the farmer what you owe him. Uncle Sam's teamsters bring you the sacks of grain every week, and Uncle Sam's teamsters will carry the money safely to Jonathan Homespun.—New Bedford Mercury.

The Spread of Christianity.

Thirty years after the ascension of our blessed Lord we read in the pages of Tacitus, the accomplished Latin historian, who was a pagan, and hated, not merely [illegible] ated christianity—"This dire superstition," [illegible] "was checked for a [illegible] it again burst forth, and not only spread over Judea, the first seat of mischief, but even introduced itself into Rome. The confessions of those who were seized discovered vast multitudes of accomplices. They were convicted of hatred to the human race." Such is the statement of Tacitus.

Another Roman writer, Pliny the younger, who was governor of Pontus and Bithynia, writing to his royal master, says, "The number of christians is so great as to call for serious consultation. The contagion of this superstition has spread, not only through cities, but through all the villages of the county." This was seventy years after the ascension of our blessed Lord, and is a triumphant proof from the mouth of one of its enemies of the rapid spread of the christian faith, in spite of every obstruction that political ingenuity could devise, or malice could invent.

Justin Martyr, a christian apologist who, was born in the year 106 says, "There is not a nation, Greek or barbarian, even those who wander in tribes, and live in tents, amongst whom prayers and thanksgivings are not offered to the Father in the name of Jesus crucified."

Clement of Alexandria, writing in the year 106, says "The doctrines of christianity are not limited to Judea, but are spread throughout the world, into every nation, village and city, Greek and barbarian."

Thus have we from the mouths of friends and foes, evidence the most irresistible, that christianity spread most rapidly during the first hundred years, after the ascension of our blessed Lord.—Dr. Cumming.

DR. CUMMING ON THE END OF THE WORLD. —On Tuesday, last week, Dr. Cumming delivered a lecture on "Prophecy" to a crowded audience in the Free-Trade Hall, Manchester. The reverend lecturer gave renewed expression to his well-known views on the exposition of the Apocalyptic symbols and other prophetic scriptures, with special reference to the future destiny of this country. He is reported to have said in the course of the lectures, that he had consulted Sir Roderick Murchison as to the truth of the statement he (Dr. Cumming) had made at his last lecture at Manchester, namely, that the interior of the earth was a burning cauldron. Sir Roderick replied that "no one but an ignoramus would dare to deny it." And when he (Dr. Cumming) quoted the words of St. Peter in support of his statement, Sir Roderick replied "that not only was Peter scientifically correct, but Job gave him (Sir Roderick) the first idea of the gold mines in Australia, and that Job was the best geologist he knew. He believed 1867 would see some great convulsions.—New York Independent.

WASHINGTON AT BOSTON.—Eighty-six years ago this month, (Nov.) Washington was eating baked apples and milk from his frugal table in the patriot camp at Cambridge. The English flag waved over Bunker hill; Charleston was in ashes; only a few black chimnies told where her cheerful homes once stood; Boston was filled with English troops, commanded by General Howe, with a plenty of arms and ammunition; the town was forsaken by its best families; the "Old South," a church dear to the people, was used as a stable, while the "North" was cut up for firewood. General Howe was in high spirits; holding Boston, he held the key of the country, as he thought; and the key in his hand, he could use it at pleasure.

AN EARLY WINTER.—Farmers and other wise people in the rural districts predict an early winter, a long one and a strong one. One of the signs is that the birds are already preparing for a flight southward, and another that the husk of the growing corn is very thick and close, and covers the ears to the very ends, a never-failing proof that overcoats and fuel will be in great demand.

For the Crisis.

For the Children who read the Crisis.

"Nothing for the children!" exclaimed a little girl, six years of age, in a tone of deep disappointment, as she looked earnestly through that column in the Crisis of last week, that is usually called the children's corner. And I felt sorry at the thought that not only this little girl, but perhaps quite a number of girls, and boys too, had been disappointed in the same way. So I resolved to write a little that would interest them in next week's paper, and it may be that others will be moved by this suggestion to say some things for the little ones, and that the editors will be willing every week to devote one column at least for their especial pleasure and instruction.

Well, dear children, I will tell you a short story, because you are always interested in stories, and will like it still better when I tell you that it is a true one. There was once a man who was considered very great and honorable, because he had fought bravely in time of war. He was captain of a large company, and had gained some splendid victories, as they are called. So he was praised exceedingly, and was consequently a very proud man. But he had something to annoy him. A very unpleasant disease, that affected his skin, that not only made him feel quite uncomfortable, but gave him an unpleasant appearance. In his family there was a young girl who had been brought from quite a distance, and who was waiting-maid to his wife. She heard his complaints daily, and knew how much he was troubled on account of the disease. So she said one day, in presence of some of the family, "I know of a man in my country who would surely cure my master." Then some one told him of it, and he decided at once to go and see that man. So he took a letter of introduction from the king in whose service he was employed, and several valuable presents, (because he was rich,) and went on his journey. When he had arrived at the place, and found where the man lived whom the little girl thought could cure him, he drove up to his house with his fine horses and carriage, and waited at the door. Now the good man of the house, instead of going out to see him, sent a messenger to the door, and told him if he would go and wash himself a few times in a river near by, he would be entirely cured. Then this great man was very angry, to think he had taken so long a journey, to be told so simple a thing as that: why, he supposed, of course, the man was coming out to say over some wonderful enchantment that would cure him at once. But to be told simply to go and wash himself in the river! No, no, he would not submit to that, and so turned away in a great rage. There were better rivers in his own country, where he could bathe if he chose." But his servants reasoned the subject with him, until he was finally persuaded to try the simple remedy. And he was entirely cured. Then he was led to believe the blessing came from God, and his pride was somewhat humbled. He returned home, not only healthier, but probably a better man.

And now, dear children, if you will open the Bible, and turn to the fifth chapter of 2d Kings, you will find this story in full. I have not told you every circumstance connected with it, but only the general items. You will find that the good prophet Elisha was the man who, by God's help, cured Naaman, the man who was diseased. There are some excellent lessons to be learned from this story, but it would make this article too long to name them. I have told it for the purpose more particularly of leading you to read your Bibles, and becoming interested in its truths. A. O. S.

The Two Gold Dollars.

"O mother, grandpa has given me two little gold dollars, to spend just as I please!" exclaimed a bright, rosy-faced boy, as he came hastening into the room where his mother sat reading.

"Has he? Well, how are you going to spend them, Joey?" and sweet lips smiled upon him, and a soft hand passed caressingly over his head.

"I am going to buy a Christmas present for cousin Louey; but I don't know what to get. Say, what shall I get, mother?" inquired the boy, lifting his sparkling eyes eagerly to the face which was bent lovingly upon him.

"Just what you please, my son."

"But mother, there are so many things, I really don't know what to get. Say, can't you tell me, mother?"

"I guess not, Joey. I think you would know better than I; exercise your own taste, and you will be sure to make a good selection. But it is getting late, and you had better go now and make your purchase."

"Where shall I go, mother—to Victor's?"

"Yes, my dear; I believe Victor keeps a good assortment of Christmas toys."

And the little boy hastened out with a light heart.

"O dear! O dear! what shall I do?" groaned a barefooted thinly-clad little girl, with tears streaming like rain down her pale cheeks.

"Why, what is the matter?" inquired a soft, gentle voice beside her.

The little girl looked up through her tears, and seeing pitying eyes bent upon her, she replied through choking sobs, pointing to the gutter.

"See there! the beautiful white bread which I just bought is all spoiled with the dirty black water."

"But how did you drop it there?"

"I didn't drop it. A bad boy came along and knocked it out of my hands, and then he laughed, he did. O dear! what shall I do? Now grandma and little Nannie will have to go without their suppers. O dear!" and the tears flowed afresh.

"But can't you buy some more bread?"

"No, I can't get any more, because that was all the money my grandma had got; and we'll have nothing to eat to-morrow, neither."

"There, don't cry;" and the two gold dollars were slipped into the little red hands. "There is money enough to buy you more bread, and a pair of shoes, too, for your cold, bare feet."

And the little Joey did not stop to hear the joyful cry and grateful words which issued from the pale lips; but he turned hastily away and bent his steps homeward, with a happy heart, feeling that it was better to buy bread for the hungry to eat, than to buy toys for his little cousin.—Evangelist.

☞ THE CRISIS is devoted to the exposition of all Bible truth; especially, the doctrine of the immediate, personal coming and reign of Christ on the earth; holiness of heart; the unconscious state of the dead; their literal resurrection, and the final destruction of the wicked.

For the Crisis.

Come, Lord Jesus!

TUNE—"My Willie's on the dark blue sea."

We wait thy coming, Savior dear,
It is our "blessed hope,"
It ever fills our hearts with cheer,
And buoys our spirits up.

CHORUS.

Then come, Lord Jesus, quickly come,
Come, bid our sorrows cease;
We long to gain our New-Earth home,
And reign with thee in peace.

When troubles rise and sorrows come,
When pressed with grief and care,
'Tis then we yearn for home, sweet home,
And sigh,—"We're almost there!"

The tomb has held thy loved ones long,
Death's chains have bound them fast;
But soon they'll sing redemption's song,
Their "night" has nearly passed.

We look abroad, and war and strife
Throughout the world abound,
And sad indeed must be this life
Till the last trump resound.

Glad omens of the day appear
In heavens, on sea and land;
Men's hearts are failing them for fear
That some dread hour's at hand.

The Pastoral Work, and the Various Gifts in the Church.

BY H. L. HASTINGS.

(Concluded.)

Nothing, then, is plainer, than that pastors are shepherds in the church. As such, they have their appropriate and important work; but that they are settled pastors, or hired ministers, our Bible I think does not clearly teach. Christ says, "I am the good shepherd." Was he a good settled pastor, preaching statedly in one place for a thousand dollars a year? or did he go abroad, leaving "the ninety and nine" in the fold, to seek for the lost sheep of the house of Israel? Christ was the "chief pastor," the great pastor, or shepherd of the sheep, and if we think God has set us in the church as pastors, we shall prove it best by doing as he did; not by staying at home and making ourselves comfortable, but by going out to lay down our lives if need be for the sheep. Read the 10th chapter of John, putting in pastor, where shepherd occurs, and see how a "good pastor" does. In our times, a pastor is a man hired to preach the gospel. Jesus said, "I am the good pastor: the good pastor giveth his life for the sheep. But he that is an hireling and not the pastor, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth: and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep. The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep. I am the good pastor, and know my sheep and am known of mine." John 10. Was Jesus Christ a paid minister over a local church? By no means. He was a pastor, a "good pastor"—the one who gave his life for the flock; and he distinguishes plainly between himself and the hireling. The pastor, or shepherd, is not an hireling, and the hireling is not the shepherd or pastor. And how often this is proved true. Many a man has toiled and worn out his life, hunting up and feeding God's flock scattered upon the hills and mountains, and no man ever called him shepherd or pastor; while after him would come in some idle, cunning man, who was an hireling, and he is called "pastor," fleeces the flock, feeds himself from it, and finally, rather than give up his hold upon them for a living, would see them rent and torn, and scattered abroad to the four winds.

The work of a pastor or shepherd in the church, is of the utmost importance. The apostles first authoritatively announced the gospel of God. The prophets reiterated it. The evangelists published the glad tidings abroad, and the shepherds were particularly required to guide, feed, and rule the believers when formed in congregations or churches. The usual term for pastors in the church seems to have been elders. The work of the shepherd or poimen was to care for the flock—as expressed by the word poimaino, rendered feeding, Luke 17: 7, or rule, Matt. 2: 6. It is rendered only in these two ways, five times "rule," and six times "feed," in the New Testament. Both renderings are right, as far as they go, but poimaino means more than both of them; it means to feed, guide, and do all a shepherd's duty to a weak and helpless and defenceless flock. The apostles, having preached, were accustomed to establish their flocks by the appointment of these elders in the churches. Paul left Titus in Crete to set in order the things that were wanting and ordain elders in every church as he had appointed him. And he draws the character of the man who should be selected for this post. The Elders (presbuteroi,) or overseers, (episcopoi) or bishops, were to be men of purity, soundness in faith, blamelessness, moral excellence, and able to exhort and convince gainsayers, &c. Titus 1: 5–9. Under their care, the flock would then thrive and prosper in the absence of the apostles and evangelists.

That these were not single preachers, each stationed over a local church, but rather aged and prudent believers in the church, will appear by reference to the church at Ephesus, the very church to whom Paul wrote that God had appointed "some pastors and teachers." In the 20th chap. of Acts we read, "And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called the elders (presbuterous) of the church." There were several of them it seems, as Titus was to ordain not an elder, but elders in every city. After Paul had given them various touching admonitions he said, "Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock, poimnio, over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers (episkopous, bishops), to feed (poimainein, tend as shepherds) the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood. For I know this, that after my departing shall grievous wolves enter in among you, not sparing the FLOCK (poimniou). This passage clearly shows (1.) That Elders were Bishops; (2.) That there were several Bishops or Elders in one church, instead of there being one Elder or Bishop over an hundred churches; (3.) That the elders were shepherds or pastors, for they were overseers of the flock, and were to feed, tend, guide, or do shepherd's duty for them; (4.) That there were several of these Elders, Bishops or Pastors in the one church at Ephesus, instead of there being one elder or pastor over it; and (5.) That in the church of Ephesus, at this time, there was no pastor of any other description; for Paul sent for none to come to Ephesus but these elders; he mentions not one word about their having any other pastor, and so the statement in his epistle to the Ephesians that God had appointed pastors in the church, must have been understood by them to refer to these grave and aged men who conducted their affairs and were the overseers of the church, and not to preachers or apostles who had another office and another work as a general thing.

And the fitness of this arrangement is manifest. Many a young man undertakes to be a pastor of a church that has in it, or ought to have, perhaps a score of godly men, better able to teach him the way of faith, and the grace of God, than he is or can be to teach them without years of experience such as they have had. God calls him perhaps to be an evangelist, and proclaim the good news, and he calls them especially to feed the flock, to guide the weak, to strengthen those that faint, and to keep out grievous wolves that prowl around, to scatter or devour the flock. The work of feeding, or doing shepherd's duty to the flock of God, was not, of course, entirely confined to these elders. Christ was the great shepherd, who is yet to have one fold and one flock. He does not however represent himself to any great extent as feeding his flock in the days of his flesh, as they are now scattered abroad. But they shall yet be gathered together, and then "the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne shall feed them (poimaino) and shall lead them to living fountains of waters." Rev. 7: 17. Then, having gathered his scattered remnant, "he shall stand and feed in the strength of Jehovah, in the majesty of the name of Jehovah his God; and they shall abide: for now shall he be great unto the ends of the earth." Micah 5: 4. Yea, he shall rule (or tend or feed, poimaino) all nations with a rod of iron. Rev. 2: 27, 12: 5, 19: 15. But in the days of his flesh his work was not to feed the flock, but rather to seek out and pity those that had no shepherd, to appoint others to feed them, and then to "lay down his life for the sheep." And having done this, as he was about to go to the Father, he said, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" "Feed, (boske, pasture, tend, watch,) my lambs." "Lovest thou me? Feed, (poimaine, tend, do a shepherd's duty to,) my sheep." "Lovest thou me? Feed, (boske, pasture, tend,) my sheep."

Well did Peter perform this work. He was converted, and he strengthened his brethren. And when he drew towards the close of his ministry he transferred the command of Christ to those whom he left behind him. And to whom did he address the admonition? To "the pastor that is over you?" No; but to "the elders among you." "The elders (presbuterous) which are among you I exhort, who also am an elder, (presbuteros) and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: feed (poimanate, do a shepherd's duty to,) the flock (poimnion) of God, which is among you, taking the oversight (episkopountes) thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over (or domineering over) God's heritage, but being ensamples (types) to the flock (poimniou). And when the Chief shepherd (archipoimenos) shall appear, ye shall receive the crown of glory that fadeth not away. (The unfading, the glorious crown.) Likewise ye younger submit yourselves unto the elder: (presbuterois), yea all of you be subject one to another, and be ye clothed with humility, for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble."—1 Pet. 5: 1–5. The tone of this whole passage closely resembles Paul's charge to the Ephesian shepherds. Paul called for the elders. Peter did the same. Paul said the Holy Ghost had made them overseers over it. Peter exhorts them to take the oversight thereof. Paul told them that they should have an inheritance among the sanctified. Peter points them to the never-fading crown of glory as their reward.

From this passage it appears (1.) That the elders were the pastors, or were to do shepherd's duty to the flock; and no pastors of churches besides these are mentioned in the New Testament. (2.) Peter himself, now well stricken in years, was also an elder, as well as a witness of Christ's past sorrow and a partaker of his coming glory. As an elder he had had the charge and tending of Christ's flock, and now he transmits it—not to mere preachers, not to settled hirelings of no judgment or experience, but to the elders, presbyters, or aged men of faith and piety and gravity. (3.) These elders were bishops or overseers, like those at Ephesus, and we read of no other bishop over them, except Christ the great arch-shepherd and "bishop of our souls." (4.) They were not to care for the flock of God unwillingly and constrainedly, as though it were a burden or a task; but "willingly." (5.) They were not to do pastoral duty, for money, or filthy lucre; they were not to be salaried, hired and paid, but they were to do it of a ready mind; they were to do it, not for money's sake, but for Christ's sake. It was not a mere civil contract, so much gospel for so much cash, but, from the depths of believing hearts, they were prompted to feed the flock with "a ready mind." It was no mere human call that brought them into that position; "the Holy Ghost" had placed them to care for the flock,—the precious blood-bought church of God. Money must not have weight here; the work must be done "of a ready mind." (6.) They were not to lord and domineer over the heritage of God, but they were to be ensamples, types, going before, leading and guiding the young and the weak, and illustrating the life of Christ in all holy conversation and godliness. (7.) They were to have their reward for pastoral labor, not once a quarter, in dollars and cents, but when the Chief shepherd shall appear, to give a crown of glory to each one who has faithfully fed the flock in the cloudy and dark day. (8.) And in conclusion, as if to show clearly that he meant by elders aged men, he exhorts the younger ones, those newly come to the faith, to be subject to the elder, and finally all of them to be yielding and subject one to another, and to be clothed with humility.

These, then, were the primitive pastors or shepherds in the church of Christ. They were not salaried preachers settled over particular churches, like the pastors of more modern times. "But how, then, did these pastors get their living?" I do not know. I suppose they worked for it as I do. Why not? Paul and Barnabas, who were apostles, had to work for a living,—the elders might do the same I presume. When Paul and Barnabas went out into the wide world to labor, they had a right to a support from the people of God, for says Paul, "Who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charges? Who planteth a vineyard and eateth not of the fruit thereof? Or who feedeth a flock and eateth not of the milk thereof?"—1 Cor. 9: 9. Yet even then, they used none of these things. They asked no aid. And if Paul and Barnabas could go to warfare at their own charges, surely men that stay at home could take care of themselves, if needful. Nevertheless, as God hath ordained that they that preach the gospel should live of it, and as he that is taught in the word should communicate to him that teacheth [illegible] man labors for the spiritual benefit of a flock, they should and will be inclined to freely and gladly bestow on him of their temporal blessings to any needful extent. But the duty of pastors or elders is not performed for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind. And, hard as it might be for the reverend clergy, the would-be pastors of this age, who, while they hardly preach the gospel, yet get their living by it, and who, while feeding the flock, sometimes covet not merely the milk, but also the fleece and flesh;—hard as it would be for such persons to soil their broadcloth and blister their hands by following the plow, as better men than they have done; by making tents with Paul, fishing with Peter, or turning wooden bowls for a living with Martin Luther;—hard as it might seem to them to do so, yet they would find it greatly to their advantage in body, in brain, and in morals.

The clergy of to-day are dying of high living, and idleness, and brain work. They are a puny, feeble, flabby, consumptive, white-livered, pale set of students, so cloistered and delicate that there is in them but a very small pattern out of which to make a noble, genial, christian man. Their lives among their flocks are often constant temptations to surfeiting, and unless they put a knife to their throats, they soon break down beneath disease and temptation. O if they had less pay and more work, hard work and hand work, too, less preaching and more plowing, then would they gather inspiration with the morning breezes, and rejoice to look with undimmed vision through nature up to nature's God.

Closely connected with the work of tending the flock, is that of teaching; pastors and teachers often being identical, though this was not always the case. Christ was the great teacher, or Master. Paul was "a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity"—an apostle and a teacher of the Gentiles. 1 Tim. 2: 7, 2 Tim. 1: 11. Women were not suffered to teach in the church at Corinth, though their praying and prophesying with covered heads seems to have been allowed. The church were to teach and admonish one another in Psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. The apostles taught publicly and from house to house, and the things received from them were to be committed to faithful men who should be able to teach others. Such men were to be "apt to teach," while the aged women were to teach the younger women the duties of the christian life. When the church came together, every one had a psalm, an exhortation, or a teaching (doctrine), and all was to be done to edifying or upbuilding. Some, however, did not thrive. When, for the time, they ought to have been teachers, they had need that one should teach them. What were the principles of the doctrine of Christ? Like some now, who instead of going on to perfection draw back to destruction; and after having lived long enough to be teachers come to deny "the principles of the doctrine of Christ"—repentance from dead works, faith towards God, the teaching of baptisms, laying on of hands, the resurrection of the dead, and eternal judgment. Such may well give heed to the warning of James,—My brethren be not many teachers, knowing that we shall receive greater judgment.—James 3: 1.

The duties of teaching and of tending the flock, are therefore properly conjoined in the elders whom the Holy Ghost has made overseer over them, to feed the flock of God, "not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind." And such teaching,—the Bible class, gathered around some aged, gentle, wise disciple, to learn the word of God,—the whole church listening to the expounding of the Scriptures, by some man deep in the secrets of divine wisdom, grace and love; and then the general prophesying of all the gathered church; the psalms, the hymns, and the spiritual songs of those who sing with grace; the steadfast continuance in the apostles' teaching; the breaking of bread and prayers; the grave and wise counsel of aged men, who exhort and advise the young to purity, sobriety and gravity; the wise instructions of the aged women, given to their younger sisters in all matters pertaining to their domestic and christian lives;—and then, added to this, the going out and coming in of prophets and teachers, such as Barnabas, Simeon, Lucius and Manaen, who dwelt among the church at Antioch; the melting words of a son of consolation, or the thrilling utterances of one whose trumpet gave no uncertain sound; the sending out of faithful men, called by the Holy Ghost to preach the word; the fasting, and prayers, and laying on of hands of the church; their commending them to the grace of God when sending them away; the coming back of these missionaries, bearing the olive branch of peace, and rehearsing in the presence of the church the grace of Christ as revealed in the regions beyond; the simplicity, purity, generosity and love of these noble ones; the hospitality of Lydia; the charity of Dorcas; the zeal of those women who labored in the gospel,—all these contrast, oh! how painfully, with the gilded lies, the painted vanities, the mocking splendor and empty show of modern times, the lazy church, the hired preacher, the frothy sermons, the smooth essays, the sleeping deacons, the jingling coppers, the proud and worldly multitude, the throngs who cannot go to meeting without preaching, the dull formality, the greed, the luxury, the lust for gain, the ungodliness, the powerless formalism, and all the emptiness that attends the apostate religion of an apostate age.

The object of these varied gifts of labor is not for "the perfecting of the saints and the work of the ministry," the common translation and punctuation of the passage being both wrong; but he appointed some as apostles, and some as prophets, and some as proclaimers of the good tidings, and some as shepherds and instructors, for the perfecting of the saints unto the work of service, unto the upbuilding of the body of the Anointed, "till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ," &c., &c. This object is twofold. (1.) To perfect the saints for the work of service, not "THE ministry" but simply service, or putting them in working order for doing good and serving God. (2.) To upbuild the church, the body of Christ, till we all pass beyond the period of childhood, put away childish things, become men, and are no more tossed about by human craft, but grow up into Christ in all things, who is our Head and Lord. And oh! how much the church needs today the results—not of some tempest from "clouds without water," but of this kind and christian training from those whom the Holy Ghost appoints to this work. O that the church might return to primitive faith and practice once more!

But will there be a change? Will men search and see, and reform? Not while their fear towards God is taught by the commandments of men. Not while would-be pastors lead captive the weak. Not while men after their own lusts heap to themselves teachers having itching ears, instead of following the word of God. Not while preachers are too proud to work, and say, "Put me in a pastor's office, that I may eat a piece of bread." Not till He comes for whom his church shall cry, both day and night. Still, God has more than seven thousand that have not bowed the knee to the abominations of this age. May he lead them in peace, and multiply their number, adding to them daily such as shall be saved; and may each of us learn our true position in the church of Christ, and fill it faithfully to the glory of God the Father. Amen.

Providence, R. I., Nov. 19, 1861.

For the Crisis.

The Time of Trouble.

It cannot but be apparent to every Bible student, that the time of trouble, which is to come on the earth just previous to the deliverance of all whose names are found written in the book of life, is just upon us. Like the eddying of an awful whirlpool, we begin to feel the strong current drawing us back towards its terrible vortex. But will the noble ship of Zion out-ride the danger? Most certainly, if all who are on board obey the commands of the Captain of our salvation, who says, "In your patience possess ye your souls."

Some of those who are looking for speedy deliverance are predicting a persecution of the church, which may come upon us; but I cannot see any government or power at present that dares to institute an universal edict. There may be some localities, even in Protestant countries, where freedom of worship is in some measure restricted, but we know that in all the revolutions and wars of nations of late years, the result has been a weakening of the domineering or persecuting power, and the freedom of speech and of the press commands greater respect now than it has for centuries past. The passage in Daniel where this is spoken of seems to imply a national trouble, and this harmonizes with the prophecy of Luke,—"Distress of nations with perplexity"; but I have failed to see any evidence that the church will suffer any further than will be consequent on being a component part of the nation, and this will undoubtedly be severe enough to elicit a cry day and night for deliverance. I think the nations of the earth will be so much engaged in combating with each other that the little flock will hardly be noticed by them. If there was to be danger of persecution at this time, I think the church would have had some warning or intimation of it. The instructions are to "fear not," but "lift up your heads," for "redemption draweth nigh."

But let us be prepared for the worst, for in this fast age we see mighty changes and evolutions among nations in a short space of time. Who can predict what will be the state of the world one year from this time? Who knows but the monarchs of Europe will combine to blot out this formidable barrier to their existence—the American Republic? Who can say that the preparation for war now being made in this country is not destined to resist foreign aggression? Who can say that this nation will ever be at peace again in its own borders? Who can deny that the earth's cup of iniquity is full, and we in America, who have had so much light, have begun to drink its dregs? And last of all, who is living as though he believed that the Lord is "near, even at the doors"?

For the Crisis.

"The Harvest is Ripe."

BY S. S. BREWER.

"Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe: come, get ye down, for the press is full, the fats overflow; for their wickedness is great."—JOEL.

Our divine Lord and Master in speaking to his hearers in parables, declared the harvest to be the end of the world. Admitting the truth he spoke, what a decided negative the prophet has given us in the foregoing passage to the popular theory of a temporal millennium. The prophet Daniel has declared "the wicked shall do wickedly"; and our beloved brother Paul speaking in his Epistle declares, "Evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse."

I purpose to present a number of testimonies as evidence of the solemn fact, that in many parts of the world masses have degenerated into a state of moral putrefaction. Alas! alas! how humiliating the sad picture. The North American has said, "From the terrible evidences of human depravity which develop themselves from day to day, we begin to think that our cities are rapidly descending to the level of Sodom and Gomorrah." We purpose to show that other cities in foreign lands are in the same, if not a worse condition.

The N. Y. Chronicle has said, "Never was crime more rampant than now; garroting, burglary, stabbing, fraud, lewdness, forgery, embezzlement, and every imaginable form of wrong, cruelty and murder meet us at every turn."

The Honesville Times has said, "The records of the past have never presented a more corrupt state of society than now exists." The following item I clipped some few years since from the Richmond, (Va.) Penny Post, (Aug. 11):—

"THE INCREASE OF CRIME.—The enormous increase of crime which marks in so palpable a manner the age in which we live, is arresting the attention of the press in some portions of the country. The truth of the charge is but too plainly verified, as a cotemporary remarks, that 'individual and national villainy never flaunted in such gay colors, or stalked forth with such an easy or assured challenge.' Murders, rapes and robberies are things which are at present rife to an appalling extent, so much so, indeed, that it might seem as if the demon of recklessness and sin had been turned loose upon our fair land to run riot and spread desolation and misery in its wake. These things, we say, must be apparent to the most unobservant eye. To trace their causes and give a satisfactory explanation of the direful condition of affairs in a manner at once well defined and conclusive in every instance, would require little short of the ken of omniscience."

"THE INCREASE OF CRIME.—Every press in the United States teems with long homilies on the subject of 'the increase of crime.' Crime, according to the public journals, has been fearfully and overwhelmingly on the increase for at least ten years. After all it is not half so plentiful here as it is in other parts of the civilized world. For example—a London paper, brought by the Persia, is now before us. It contains the doings of a single week in and about the great metropolis. Among the criminal records, are accounts of nine murders; three of them committed by husbands upon the bodies of their unoffending wives. There are twenty-three outrages, robberies particularized, and seventeen assaults and batteries. These are all of the most aggravated description. One was accomplished by two sisters upon another woman who lived in the house."

A report of the chief of the New York police for six months is as follows:—

"It appears from the semi-annual report of the chief of police of New York, that over 25,000 persons were arrested in that place for criminal offences during six months ending with the month of June, being an increase of 2874 over those of the previous six months, and an increase of 7897 over those of the corresponding period last year."

Here is another editorial from a New York paper:—

"PREVALENCE OF CRIME.—Amidst the general intelligence and universal diffusion of knowledge, as well as the general adaptation of the manifold approved appliances for material comfort, which are essentially the characteristics of this age, the question naturally arises, why is there so much crime and immorality among us? It would seem, with our increased facilities, the arcana of science, with our increased knowledge of life and the laws governing it, the power gained is used for evil instead of good. If we take our only chronicles of modern history, the newspapers of the day for authority, it is but too palpable that crime has been for some time past steadily on the increase. The public journals throughout the country are filled with detailed accounts of acts, many of them of such monstrous nature, so revolting in their monstrosity, as to cause the heart of humanity to recoil within itself, and weep tears of blood that it is human.

It is a fearful truth that the moral has not kept pace with the intellectual development of our country. We have lost the simplicity and sturdy integrity of our forefathers, and have learned to help ourselves at the expense of our neighbors, oftentimes at the cost of his life, with a coolness and dexterity that would be admirable if it were used in a better cause. Deeds of darkness and crime are, at the present, every day affairs. A man wants a few dollars, and he has only to twist the neck of another man, or run him through with a dirk—he being so well read in anatomy as to know the precise point to strike, and he possesses at once a competency, and the whole affair passes, in the onward hurry of every day life, as one of the nine days wonders, to be talked of and forgotten. A woman is perhaps out of small change, and, wishing to secure a little pocket money, goes out to seek her fortune; when the next day some such paragraph as the following appears in the public prints:—

'On Tuesday evening Miss Fitzgerald, a young lady, had her pocket picked, in one of our avenue D. stages, of $10. She was returning home from Williamsburgh, and soon after paying her fare, a well dressed female sitting next her, very kindly perfumed her clothing with a handkerchief saturated with perfumery and chloroform. The young lady fell asleep, and, upon waking soon after, was astonished to find that her money was taken and the lady had disappeared.'

Now we read of an unnatural father, who, for no apparent cause, beats and starves his innocent little daughter day after day, until death is the inevitable result. Again, we hear of a woman, a member of excellent standing, not only of an unexceptionable church, but of society generally, who practices such a savage system of torture upon an unprotected and helpless little girl placed in her charge, now starving, now freezing and beating her, ad libitum, because she grows ill and feeble under the starving and freezing process, compelling her to work, meantime, until she literally drops dead before her eyes. We hear of step-mothers branding the backs of the first wife's children with hot flat irons for the most trivial cause; of step-fathers murdering their step-children, because they are in the way; of sons shooting their parents; and young children murdering their companions. [A recent paper, of Oct. 3d, states that boy suicides have been alarmingly frequent of late in various parts of the country.] Larcenies, and all manner of robberies, up to the most respectable grades of forgeries, are such common place affairs as to occasion scarce a second thought. Fornication, adultery, and all manner of licentiousness stalk abroad shameless and unchecked in broad daylight, those in the highest places being for the most part the least blameless. Scarce a week elapses but we have two or three revolting accounts filling our papers of the moral depravity of some minister of Christ. Such is the statement, pretty much as we find it in the morning papers, adding but one more tale of wrong and perfidy to the overwhelming list. This, like its predecessors, will be for a short time gossiped about, to be forgotten for some fresher bit of scandal or crime. There can be no effect without a corresponding cause is most true, but to rake up the adequate cause from such a putrid mass of abomination, of guilt and crime, an Augean stable of more years' accumulation than that of old, would require the perseverance and indomitable courage of a second Hercules. It is the result of a complication of moral diseases, having their origin, for the most part, in that 'idleness which precedes want, vice and misery,' and the total ignoring, from the sainted and scented minister of God in his fine linen and rustling robes, down to the raggedest pickpocket of the pave."

Merciful Father! what a sad picture for thy pure and holy eyes to look upon, after eighteen centuries of long suffering under the gospel. Here is an article from the N. Y. Tribune:—

"BURGLARS AND PICKPOCKETS' EMIGRANT AID SOCIETY.—It is well known that a large proportion of the worst criminals in this country are graduates of the schools of London and other British towns. There crime is followed as a life profession, and its workings rendered to a science; its professors are systematically organized, according to their different branches, and burglars, thieves, garroters, and others, are divided into groups and series, working harmoniously for the good of the whole. It seems, according to the statement in the Police Gazette, that they have a society to raise funds to enable them to emigrate to this country."

We have given a few among the many articles we have of late gleaned from various sources, in which writers seem astonished at the alarming condition of the morals of society in our country. The picture is a very, very dark one, and no language that can be used is more definite than that of the prophet,—"The fats overflow; for their wickedness is great." Such are the Shadows of the Evening. May God in mercy prepare us for the storm that is soon to burst on this wicked world, that we may be counted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and stand before the Son of man. Truly,—

For the Crisis.

Minutes of the 13th R. I. Quarterly Conference.

Wednesday, Sept. 25th, 1861. Conference met according to adjournment. A few of the ministering brethren were present. The first afternoon was devoted to a conference and prayer meeting. The brethren, wearied and worn by preaching and travelling, came together to enjoy each other's society, and exchange words of mutual consolation and encouragement.

Thursday 9 o'clock, A. M. Moderator in the chair. Prayer by Bro. Huntington. Report of the last conference called for and read. Bro. Brown objected to having his name used as offering the resolution for discussion at the previous conference, because in the resolution he had embodied what had previously been proposed by other brethren. Bro. Hastings corrected his text as it appeared in the report, from the 23d chap. of Luke instead of the 19th chap. of John. Moved that with the above corrections the report be accepted. Carried.

Delegates were called upon to report from their respective churches. Dr. Huntington said the church in Abington, Ct., requested to join the conference. Moved and carried. He said the church was in a good condition spiritually, about the same as they had been for a year past. There are some faithful brethren who strive together and enjoy a good degree of God's blessing.

The Clerk reported from Foster church. Some are growing in the cause of Christ. Some are cold in their interest and enervate in their exertions; but generally there is a growing in grace. Some hopeful conversions, we trust. The conference in Foster we believe has proved a blessing to many. Bro. Carpenter appeared as delegate unofficially from the Danielsonville church. He was not elected by the church as a delegate, but it was generally understood that he should represent them at the conference. He had no very encouraging report to make from that church. It was not in a very prosperous condition spiritually. One reason was, the cares of this life had drawn their interest from the cause of Christ. Some had tongues which need cooling. Meetings were thinly attended. There were some, however, who were wrestling with God for a revival of pure and undefiled religion. They were hoping for a revival interest and refreshing seasons from the presence of the Lord.

Bro. E. Bellows reported from the Chestnut Hill church. He was laboring with that church part of the time. The church was organized under the labors of Eld. J. Hemenway. Some of the timber that was put into the building was not good. He expected some poor as well as good timber would be put into a building. They have been in a low spiritual condition. There is a large congregation which comes out to hear preaching. There is a seed there that will be gathered in the harvest time. Encouraging omens outside of the church. The F. W. B. minister in the place is three quarters Advent. He has been turned out of his pastoral charge. He has preached against war.

Bro. Hastings reported unofficially from the Providence church. Things continue about as they have been. There have been four baptized. Meetings rather increasing. Preaching sometimes from him and sometimes from Bro. Brown. Not as much spirit of labor as there ought to be.

Bro. B. Arnold reported from Exeter church. There was not anything very important from that church. The flock there was scattered, but a few were walking in the narrow path.

Friday 9 o'clock, A. M., Moderator in the chair. A report by letter was received and read from the River Point church. The following is copied: "Church not dead. Have three prayer meetings per week, and they are quite lively. We have preaching generally two or three Sundays in a month. Two weeks ago two joined the church. Two weeks ago two of our brethren went to the war. . . . J. P. Babcock."

Bro. Reynold's reported from Central Church. It has sixteen members. We are opposed to war, and to the use of intoxicating liquors. We are trying to labor in the cause of Christ, and become acquainted with the great truths of the Bible.

The spirit of God was with us to bless. Many hearts were made glad, and brethren from different localities were encouraged by enjoying each other's society in prayer and exhortation, by rehearsing their trials, and telling their joys and buckling on anew the armor of Christ. That the church in Rocky Brook might be benefited by this meeting, was the earnest prayer of all christian friends who met with them in conference.

The following ministers preached the word: Eld. Thomas Huntington, Matt. 5: 6. Eld. H. L. Hastings, 2 Cor. 6: 4. Eld. J. D. Brown, Gal. 6: 14. Eld. M. B. Phetteplace, Rev. 3: 21. Eld. S. C. [illegible], John 19: 34.

The preaching was accompanied by the spirit of God. We hope much good was accomplished by sowing the gospel seed, that may bring forth its sixty and a hundred fold in this life and reap life ever- [illegible]

The World's Crisis AND SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, Dec. 11, 1861.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

Hereafter all letters, communications, remittances and orders for the World's Crisis are to be directed to ELDER MILES GRANT, Boston, Mass.
H. L. Hastings, President C. P. S.

Commencement of the 1260 Days.

It is a point of deep interest to the Bible student, who loves the appearing of Christ, to ascertain the beginning of the 1260 days, or the "time, and times, and half a time." We think there is scarcely any room to doubt that these days represent 1260 years, and are applicable to the "little horn" power mentioned in the seventh chapter of Daniel's prophecy, and the Leopard beast in John's, which evidently represent the same thing. And, further, we think there is no doubt but that these symbols represent the Papal system during the time of its supremacy, when the saints were under its "dominion." As the children of God have been crushed and martyred by this power during a long period in the past, and are not now under its dominion, it follows, we think, that the period indicated by the "time and times and the dividing of time" is now ended; consequently, we have good reason to look for the date of its commencement and termination.

Mr. Bickersteth thinks "the most probable period" for the commencement of the 1260 days "is that of . . . 533." We think there are strong reasons for believing that they did not begin later than A. D. 533; as it may be most clearly shown from the uniform testimony of history, that the Vandals, one of the ten horns of Daniel's fourth beast, was "plucked up by the roots" in A. D. 534. As this work was done by the "little horn," it follows that it must have been in existence before it made this conquest. If it received its power by the decree of Justinian in 533, then its "time and times and the dividing of time," or 1260 days, [each for a year,] would terminate in 1868; but there is considerable evidence that it might have been set up earlier. Past and passing events indicate that the present dispensation will not extend more than six or seven years longer, and it may terminate much earlier. The work of the faithful is nearly done. Let all now press forward with unwavering confidence in the great Captain of our salvation. His followers are sure of success. Be strong in him, and all will be well. This is the hour of peril. Do not sleep now, lest all be lost for ever.

Bills! Bills!

This is not a very pleasing heading, but we could think of no better one for the subject. It has been our practice to send bills once in six months, in consequence of the hard times, and other reasons, this has not been done for over a year. Next week we purpose to send bills to those who have paid only to No. 260, and who will be owing for two years at the close of the present volume, which is now half out. As it is expected that all will pay in advance, we add to the bills the dollar for the present volume which was due three months since.

It is presumed that some are ready to pay what is due, who are not aware of the amount of their indebtedness; others will not be able to pay all at present, on account of their straitened circumstances. To such we say, pay what you can; others may not be able to pay anything now, and yet love the paper, and feel as though they could not get along without it. Dear brethren, you have our sympathies, and we wish to send you the Crisis as long as we possibly can, and not run in debt. Can you not get a new subscriber, and thus help us bear the burden; or if you can not do that, will you please drop us a line, if you wish the paper continued. Our free list is about four hundred, but we had rather add to it than to cut off any of the poor.

From the first, we have felt anxious that the poor should have a free paper, so long as the Crisis is published. Thus far the Lord has prospered us in this course, and we have no reason to fear that he will not in time to come, if we conduct the paper to his glory. In order that we may continue this course it seems necessary that those who can possibly pay, should do so as soon as possible. Will you do us the favor to read the article concerning the Granary, on the fourth page of No. 12, dated Dec. 4th?—o.

Our Hearty Thanks are due for the many encouraging letters received, from our correspondents. They make our burdens much lighter, and stimulate us to spare no effort to make our paper a source of comfort and profit to all its readers. While we feel very thankful for the hearty testimonials of approval, our friends will please excuse us for not publishing them, and be content with the assurance that they are highly appreciated.—o. [illegible]

Conference at Poultney, Vt.

We hope to see a large gathering at this meeting, beginning Wednesday evening, Dec. 18th, to continue through the week and over the Lord's day. Bro. Mathewson, Batchelor, and others are expected to be present to preach the word.

The object of this meeting is to awaken new interest in the cause of Christ in all that section of country; consequently, the Poultney church invite the different churches in Vt. and Eastern N. Y. to meet with them in this union meeting. Come, brethren and sisters, let us rally in the name of the Lord. Our foes are many and strong, and our work is short but earnest.—o.

New Subscribers.—When the names of new subscribers are sent, please say that they are new, and it will save us considerable labor at the office. If it is not stated, then we have to spend considerable time in looking over our records to ascertain whether the name is already on our books. Please remember to say new, whenever a new subscriber is sent, and we shall be much obliged to you.—o.

Business Matters.—If those who send us business items, or appointments, will take the trouble to put them on a separate piece of paper, they would do us a kindness, and receive our thanks in return for the favor.—o.

Private Letters.—It frequently happens that persons wish to address the Editor on matters not connected with the office. In such cases, please write the word Private on the outside of the envelope.—o.

Good News.—We learn by H. V. Reed, through the Millennial Harbinger, that "Bro. John Howell sits up most of the time, and has ridden out several times. We hope he will soon be well again."—o.

Wayside Gleanings.—On account of the hard times, this interesting volume is now offered for 50 cents, instead of 75. This is a good chance to purchase this choice collection of prose and poetical articles from the pen of Fannie Parry, "Pine Avenue," who was a young lady of deep piety, and one of the best contributors we ever had to the columns of the Crisis.—o.

Exemption from the "Time of Trouble."

It is often asked, if Christians are to suffer in the time of trouble? We think not: First, because the "time of trouble" is expressive of the judgments God will pour out upon the anti-Christian nations, and does not necessarily sustain any relation to the Church.

Second, because the Church of God needs nothing of this kind in order to its salvation. "In the world ye shall have tribulation," has been the standing rule for eighteen hundred years. From this common lot of all that follow Jesus, there is no exemption. Further than this, we fail to find evidence, either in the Scriptures, or in the nature of things. The Papist, believing that more than the tribulation common to the Christian in this world is necessary to his final preparation for a better world, has invented and added to his creed the ordeal of purgatory. As Protestants, we reject any such dogma. That the followers of Christ were to be, and are, in the last days subject to unusual perils, St. Paul testifies, (2 Tim. 3,) but that they were appointed to meet a necessity in the Church, is no where affirmed. It is true God hath chosen Jacob in the furnace of affliction,—that they are as a bush that burns, but thank God! does not consume—are to be made white and tried, the trial of whose faith is more precious than that of gold,—but all this fails to prove that anything out of the ordinary dispensation of grace is necessary or will be applied to make ready the last generation of Christians. The quixotic and marvelous may please themselves by such a faith; and indolent, sleeping virgins may hope something will occur by which their salvation will be made more sure to them; but let all such know that it is a scriptural faith in the blood of the Lamb that will suffice for their purification and salvation, and by that only can they be saved. It is written of the innumerable multitude, that they came up through great tribulation; but it is added, they had "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." And we know of no evidence to believe this is not a fair and faithful picture of all the finally saved. The Christian who does not know what tribulation is,—what the "hundred-fold with persecution" is,—has certainly but small claims to the patrimony of a disciple.

Lastly, we may add, we believe the Scriptures clearly teach that these judgments are not to afflict the Church. When God's ancient people made their exit from Egypt, it was in the midst of judgments—a fact clearly typical of the final exodus of the Church: but be it remembered, that from all these judgments God's people were exempted. It is written by the Psalmist, (Ps. 71: 5–8,) "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day, nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the de- [illegible] behold and see the reward of the wicked:" —a vision the Church has yet to see. Again, "Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of God in their foreheads," (Rev. 7: 3,) is a passage clearly indicative of the fact that the work of gathering and sealing God's Church ends before these judgments are inflicted. Let us then take to ourselves the admonition, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."—M.

Lay Preachers—Helps.

The reason why we said what we did with reference to lay-preachers, grew out of a deep and painful conviction, that there is an immense amount of buried talent in the professed church of God, that is now specially needed; with the right use of which God might be specially glorified; and without which multitudes now dreaming of a better world, and perhaps in the daily habit of offering prosy prayers, yet can never hear it said by their divine Lord, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." God requires an entire consecration: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with ALL thy heart"; and it then follows that every man must do all he can for Christ in his respective sphere. If then to any is imparted the gift of utterance, with a becoming understanding—or in other words with good solid common-sense—and this be coupled with the fear and love of God, we see no reason why such should not improve their talent to their utmost, whether ordained by the laying on of the hands of the presbytery or not.

We do not perceive that in this there is anything conflicting with the normal state of a true church of Christ. Indeed we believe that this fact has come to be all but universally conceded; and the practical working of the fact has been seen in the additional prosperity that has been given to religious interests since the reformation. Before the reformation the laity took little or no interest in religious things; now, the christian world is alive with colporters, Bible and Tract agents, exhorters, lay-preachers, Sunday School teachers, etc. ad libitum, all having for their basis the lay element.

But it may be seriously questioned, whether such an arrangement would not be, and is not, subversive of the order and wholesome growth of the church. To this we reply, if to have the "life of God" suffused throughout the entire mystical body of Christ is subversive of the church's interest, then is this arrangement to be proscribed; but if, on the contrary, for every member to work the work of God, in his measure, is the legitimate result of imparting the divine life to the human heart, any other arrangement,—an arrangement by which this element is to be crippled, shut up, and smothered, whether in a monastery or elsewhere,—belongs only to a priest-ridden Europe, and the darkest days of the mediæval ages. Yet we are not insensible to the abuses to which this element is liable when carried to the extreme. We think we discern it in modern sectarianism; in the spirit of come-out-ism or secession-ism—rebellion against lawful and wholesome rule. Making every man exclusively his own sovereign in politics, and his own priest in the church. In other words, it is a perverse individual-ism, legitimately knowing no limits short of being independent of everything human and divine. It is a position which many a man of modern times, (applauded, may be, as an eminently good man,) having set his hand to correct and right up a rickety old world, has scarcely failed to take, and perhaps would take fully but for an over-ruling goodness preventing him. It is alike the position of infidels and modern sectarian leaders who know nothing on earth to which they should be subordinate. They "speak evil of dignities," cry for liberty, equality, and fraternity, that can never be until the dawn of a better day. They adopt measures that never did exist in Church or State, and which are conducive only of that lawlessness that can never rest short of dissolving the fabric of both Church and State into the very dust of chaos. They cry stoutly against Babylon, and are the chief promoters of anarchy. With them, nothing is right that is. Honi soit qui mal y pense.

But we forbear. Against these evils we persistently protest, while in the organized body of Christ we contend there is room for all to live and labor who truly love and follow our Lord Jesus Christ. And "lay-preachers" are to be sought out and employed, not only as a providential means offered us, to aid in the work of the church, but as a divinely appointed means, known in the ancient church as "Helps," and were so called by St. Paul. 1 Cor. 12: 28.

"Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest."—M.

Thessalonica or the Model Church.—"The author of this earnest and ably written volume considers the church at Thessalonica as a model church, and devotes his book to an analytical statement of its peculiarities, its founding, its ministry, faith, hope, and practice. In the course of his examination he finds that our modern churches suffer greatly by comparison with [illegible]

Paul's "desire to depart."

In the "Improved Version" of the New Testament, we find the following note in connection with the translation of Phil. 1: 22–24. The translation reads:—"But if it be given me to live in the flesh, this preaching of Christ is the fruit of my labor; yet what I shall choose I know not; but I am in a strait between the two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; for this would be very far better."

The words in italics are thus in the translation. The following is the note in the margin:—

"The apostle probably thought that the advent of Christ to raise the dead was very near. See 1 Thess. 4: 13–18, and therefore judged that a quiet rest in the grave till that event, would be to himself preferable to a life of suffering and persecution; though he was content to continue in his present suffering state for the benefit of the church. At any rate he could not mean to express an expectation of an intermediate state of enjoyment between death and the resurrection; for he hints at no such topic of consolation to the bereaved Thessalonians in the passage above cited. And if he had expected that a state of felicity would have immediately succeeded the dissolution of the body, it would have been impossible for him to have declared to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. 15: 17, 18, that if the dead rise not, their faith would be vain, and that all who had fallen asleep in Christ were perished."

In the same Version we find the following translation of 1 Thess. 4: 15–18:—

"For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who shall be alive, and who shall remain to the appearance of the Lord, shall not be before those that are fallen asleep. For the Lord himself will come down from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God; and the dead in Christ will rise first; afterward, we who shall be alive, and who shall remain, shall be caught up together with them into the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and then we shall ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort ye one another with these words."

In the margin is the following note on the foregoing:—

"Observe here, that all the consolation which the apostle administers to the bereaved and mourning Thessalonians is derived from the christian hope of a resurrection, and from what would happen at that awful and glorious period. He takes no notice of an intervening state of perception and felicity of which their deceased friends were even then in possession. A circumstance which the apostle could hardly have omitted had the existence of such a state been revealed to him."

We think the foregoing sensible remarks commend themselves to every candid reader, and are in strict harmony with the teachings of the Scriptures.—o.

For the Crisis.

Receiving and Doing.

"But he that received seed into the good ground, is he that heareth the word, and understandeth it; which also beareth fruit, and bringeth forth, some an hundred-fold, some sixty, some thirty."—Matt. 13: 23.

The above text serves to illustrate two important features in christian life; viz., receiving and doing. We are exhorted to "receive with meekness the ingrafted word," and to be "doers of the word and not hearers only." It is no less a duty to do, than it is to hear; and all-important that we be active as well as receptive christians. There is no healthy physical life without a proper balance of the active and receptive habitudes of the body. If a man eat too much and act too little, he will become gross and gouty, or dull and dyspeptic. The same principle holds good in the mental life. A receptive habit of mind, that only finds satisfaction in devouring without digesting, is mental death to a man. It is opposed alike to healthy mental life and positive usefulness in the world.

The facts with regard to body and mind serve to illustrate with peculiar force the danger of the receptive habits of mind that prevail in the christian church. It is no less an age of preaching, than reading. All over the land, congregations of uncounted thousands go up every Sunday to be played upon by sermons—to have their intellects quickened, their sympathies excited, their imaginations inspired, and their whole spiritual natures acted upon by the preacher; it matters not so much what he may preach, if he only give his people a feast. Some of his hearers are what may be termed the intellectual class; some are sympathetic; and others of a devotional mind: all go to hear, and a few with a purpose to practice that which is good. Those that hear from the pulpit that which pleases them, have a feast, and go away rejoicing; while others who fail to receive that exciting power from the preacher that they desire, call it dry. Many attend prayer-meetings, precisely on the same principle that others go to a ball—to have a good time. They love to have their hearts raked open and stirred by an eloquent exhortation, or melted by the pathos of a touching prayer. Their religious exercises have become a sort of holy amusement; they care not so much to learn to do well, as they do to be made to feel well.

Some of the most inefficient churches we have are those which have what is called great preaching, and preaching every Sabbath. The people go to meeting to feast. They receive the word, and perhaps they feel well. But where is the fruit? What has become of the seed sown? It has fallen upon unfruitful soil. The people have [illegible] give them stimulating draughts, to excite and quicken their stupid natures.

Virtue consists in action. It was said by the Apostle, "If any would not work, neither should he eat." The church should learn that its power in the world depends on what it does, and not on what it feels. Strength is won by action, and success by work. Continual feeding, without work, is a procurer of spiritual gout and debility. We find in the church a multitude of gouty, sickly, dyspeptic, complaining christians. What is the cause? It is not for the want of wholesome truth; neither for the want of preaching, or christian society; but for the want of that spiritual exercise that produces a healthy spiritual life. They have had so many privileges, and so much truth, without acting and bringing forth fruit, that they have become dainty, and dull, and complaining of the want of feeling. I know of many small churches that do not have preaching more than one fourth part of the time,—and then not one of the "sons of thunder" to preach,—that enjoy much more life, and do much more work towards saving their fellow men, than many of our large churches that are blessed with "great" preaching and two or three prayer meetings a week. They are preached to, sung to, and prayed to; and as the preaching, singing, and praying, feeds their emotional natures, excites their sympathies, and inspires their imaginations, that is the spiritual thermometer by which they measure the degrees of their religion. Now the whole tendency of this thing is to spiritual death. The excitement of a meeting may soon pass away; the people go out into the world and are surrounded with different influences, and perplexed with the cares of life; the excitement has passed, and they are excited upon some other topic, and at the close of the day perhaps there is a prayer meeting, they attend, but it is about as much work to get the meeting up to a stirring heat, as to get up the steam to drive a steam engine;—the fire must be built, a few cold prayers offered, a few exhortations given,—nothing moves; some hang their heads and get sleepy, till some one gets up and gives a stirring exhortation, in eloquent strains; gets happy, shouts, and has a peculiarly good time; and it is like throwing powder upon the dying embers—there is an explosion, an outburst of excitement; heads are all up, and most all are quickened and go home rejoicing. It is good to be moved by the power of the Holy Spirit; but when that moves on the heart, it produces a feeling that will be very likely to show itself in good works, as well as words.

It is good to have preaching, singing, and praying, and that which is instructive and stirring; but what better is any church or individual by it, unless it produces a fruit that is more tangible than a good feeling? What difference will it make with my careless neighbor that I have enjoyed a fine sermon, if it does not move me to efforts for his good? What will it avail my brother that preaches the gospel to me, that I feel well, if it does not lead me to feel in my pocket to furnish bread for his family, while he sacrifices his life for my good? In what way or how is the world benefitted through my having the truth, unless the principles of that truth are developed in good works? We need to be stirred up to love and good works.

There are different aspects in which christian action may be viewed with profit. There can be no growth of power of any faculty of the mind, without use. Action is the law and condition of spiritual development. That which we try to do and persist in doing becomes easy to do, because our power to do is developed in action. Christian benevolence is a grace that grows by cultivation. A man who is accustomed to give, is the man who gives freely and gladly. A man may hear five hundred sermons a year, or attend as many prayer meetings, and get happy and feel well, and still be a spiritual baby, without nerve, or faculty, or power; and even without having learned anything practically. It is only those that do their duty, that learn the doctrine aright. It is said that it is more blessed to give than to receive; but we know nothing about it until we by acts demonstrate it. A christian who does nothing, not only lacks power, but knows nothing of true christian feeling as he should.

Another aspect in which christian action may be viewed, is that which relates to the outside world. It is a notorious fact that, considering the agencies engaged in the christian work, the results are small. We have a good and great truth to present to the world, good and able preachers to present it; multitudes that have ears to hear, but little fruit of the labor is seen. Where is the difficulty? It is not in the truth, or for the want of preachers; but I think most of the difficulty is to be attributed to the constantly receptive and inactive position of the church. Now and then, here and there, it becomes active, and reformation follows. It is time that every church and each individual were awake and active in the great work before us. The judgment is at hand, and soon the day of probation will close, and we must stand before God to pass the solemn test. We should [illegible] world, her saving influence should be felt. Let each church and each member be active. If we have but one talent, let it be used; make a mark in the world somewhere for your Master. Let your christianity be seen in work, as well as words.

What shall we do? Well let us consider the work. We have a glorious gospel to promulgate to the world. We want men and money to work with. "The Lord will provide," says one. Yes sir, he will; but if he should call upon you, what would be the result? Will you leave your quiet fireside, and breast the cold winter storms, for the gospel's sake? Will you put your hand down deep in your pocket to furnish means to help them that preach the gospel? If all would act when God calls upon them, we should see more accomplished than we do at present. Why is it that many preachers have to leave the ministry and engage in the business of the world? "They have left their calling," says one; "they are backslid," says another. Well, suppose this is true; what is the cause? Many have been obliged to leave the field because the church was so indifferent to the interest of the cause, that the preacher must engage in business or starve; and others have become disheartened from the fact that the church was stupid and refused to help in the work. It is not surprising that we do not hear of more reformation, when we consider that but few take hold of the work in earnest. I have marked one thing in my experience in preaching; that is this: those that clamor the loudest against order, and talk much about the minister's trusting in God, are the ones that do but little else than talk; and the minister never would get much help in trusting to their religion. If the Lord has trusted them with property, they are many times found to be very poor stewards.

If every church, and each member, would act upon principle in religious matters, as they do in worldly business, there would be no want of funds to sustain an efficient ministry, or evangelists opening new fields of labor, and spreading the truth by scattering tracts and books in the highways and hedges. Let each reader of the Crisis pause and enquire, what is duty? Can you not lay by six cents, ten, or fifty cents per week, or month, for the purpose of giving the gospel to those that need it, and would love it, could they have the privilege of hearing and reading? Come, brethren and sisters, send along your mites to the C. P. Society, and help do the work that must be done. Preach all you can by words and works. Pray for the ministry, for the church, and all the means that can be used for building up the cause of truth. But remember that faith is dead without works. There was once a man that offered a prayer at the family altar for the poor, that the Lord would supply their wants, &c. While he was praying, a little girl came to the door to ask for a little wheat. When the man rose from his devotion, the request was made,—the reply was, that he had got his wheat all ready for market, and could not spare any for the poor. One of his children heard the prayer for the poor that morning, and thought it strange that the father should pray for the poor, and not be willing to give a little wheat to the poor girl. The child finally said to the father, "Father, if I was you, I would answer that prayer. You prayed for the poor, that their wants might be supplied; now I would give that girl some wheat and then the prayer will be answered." Remember, when you pray for sinners, and for the cause, that God may want to use some of your means to answer the prayer with. God is not mocked. It is a great blessing to have the truth preached to us, but to receive the benefit of the truth, we should practice as well as preach. J. H.

Publication of "The Coming Struggle."—Who will Aid?

At the earnest solicitation of many brethren I have resolved, by the blessing of God, and the aid of friends, to have "The Coming Struggle published in pamphlet form. I have written to Bro. Hastings, who assures me that he will superintend its publication, when the necessary amount of money shall be advanced. Judging from his statement of the cost of publishing his "Reasons for my Hope," I conclude that one hundred and fifty dollars will publish 1000 copies in similar type and style.

Now, brethren, I have no doubt but the work will be published, but only through your aid. As I have spent most of my time during the last year in preaching a free gospel, I have no means at command myself. But I am willing to give the time spent in preparing the article,—six weeks,—with several days more of necessary attention, besides some pecuniary outlay toward getting out the first thousand without any return. Who else will do as much and receive the pamphlets at cost in return, including the charges of forwarding by mail? Or, if you can't do as much, will you do what you can, though but a mite, and send it to the Crisis, where the Editors, I trust, will publish the weekly remittances, from whom Bro. Hastings will receive the same?

Thus the first thousand will go only to subscribers. Hence all who wish for the pamphlet within one year, perhaps, will find it necessary to subscribe to this fund. [illegible]

Correspondence.

From Sr. L. M. Collins.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—It is with a sorrowing heart that I take my pen to communicate to the readers of the Crisis. Since my last letter, I have been deeply afflicted. My dear husband fell asleep in Jesus the 3d of Nov. He was sick with typhoid fever; still it was not the fever that caused his death. He had other complaints of twenty years standing, which proved themselves to be beyond the control of any earthly physician. All was done that could be for his restoration, but to no purpose. Death had marked him for his victim. But thanks be to God, the King of terrors cannot hold him long. He would have been 36 years of age had he lived until the 18th of Dec.

In the winter of 1842, he was converted under the labors of Eld.'s Cole and Palmer. He was buried in baptism by the latter, Jan. 1st, 1843. He united with the Methodist church, and remained a member of it until 1853. He then heard the sound of a coming Savior, and was willing to give up all for Christ. He has often wished for the good old times of '54. He was firmly settled on the doctrine of immortality through Christ. He loved to meditate upon it by day and by night. The Crisis he has ever considered next to his Bible. Many thanks for the continuance of it while he lived. He died peaceful and happy; had no fears of death; said that the blessed Savior would not let him suffer, and he should get rid of all the troubles that were coming on the earth. Still he said that he had hoped we might live together an unbroken family until the Lord should come, which he believed would be in a very little while. But he is gone, and all I can say is, that I have seen a christian die. I had no heart to hold him. I saw at once that it would be wicked in me to do so, his sufferings were so great. I could give you no idea of what he has suffered for several years past, so I will not attempt it. Pray for me and mine.

From Bro. W. Sheldon.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—Last night I arrived at home, after an absence of five weeks on a tour into Iowa, of about 150 miles distance, whither I went at the solicitation of Elder P. S. W. Deyo, to hold a protracted meeting. The meeting was held at Strawberry Point, in the Baptist meeting-house. It was one of the hardest places in which I ever tried to hold a protracted meeting. I told the friends that Gabriel would need to blow his trumpet, to reach the feelings of the people in that village. I remained long enough to preach twenty-nine sermons. I preached fourteen before any one manifested a desire for salvation; then seven came forward for prayers. In short, as the result of the meeting, a mass of prejudice was removed from the public mind, the church was raised up from a low state, several sinners were converted, and a number of backsliders were reclaimed. I baptized six souls before the close of the meeting, and Bro. Deyo was to baptize one or two the day after its close. I was made glad to see thirteen rejoicing souls united with the church while there, with a prospect of several speedy additions. The Lord prosper them. Amen.

We heartily rejoice to see you again in the Editorial chair, and shall do what we can to support the paper.

Merrimack, Sauk Co., Wis., Nov. 15, '61.

From Eld. L. Boutell.

BRETHREN:—These are times when every effort possible should be put forth for the salvation of men. Conferences and protracted meetings will, by the blessing of God, be profitable. "Let us not sleep, as do others, but let us watch and be sober." Without holiness no man can see the Lord. Beware of the spirit of the times. Fashion, pride, self-righteousness, the love of the world, with the spirit of war, will ruin our hope and result in death.

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Danielsonville, Ct., of congestion of the brain, Sept. 30th, HATTIE MARIA, youngest child of Mr. Sumner and Sr. Mary F. Holt, aged five months and eight days.

This little one, though apparently healthful till a few days before its death, made but a brief tarry in this life; yet its stay was long enough to become the favorite of the household which it came to gladden. It was unusually beloved, as death's victims generally are, by both parents, its sisters and brothers. Death made a deep wound as he snatched it so suddenly away, but though he may wound, he cannot always destroy. A stronger than he shall spoil him of his hidden treasures. Little ones, o'er whose fall many a Rachel weeps, shall come again from the enemy's land. Among them Hattie too will come and find, we trust, brothers, sisters, parents "to meet her in the promised land." The writer endeavored to comfort and instruct the afflicted from Lam. 3: 33. H. F. C.

Died, in Sandisfield, Mass., Nov. 20th, 1861, Sr. MATILDA L., wife of Harley Hubbard, aged 22 years and 5 months.

Another has fallen in the prime of life by that dreadful pulmonic disease, consumption. Oh! when will Jesus' soft hand wipe away our tears, by abolishing sickness, sorrow and death? Thank God for the evidence we have that the time is near, when there will be no death, neither sorrow, nor crying.

Sister H. was the only child of her mother. She has a half brother living in the far west, who, in his last letter home, expressed a desire to see his poor sick sister. Well, Edwin, thine eyes may behold her in that day of gathering, if thou art the Lord's servant. Though it will not be the poor sick sister, who was sown in weakness, for she will be raised in power. Yes, instead of the hectic flush on her cheek, will be the bloom of immortal vigor. May God help you, with her lonely companion and parents, to be prepared to meet her where parting will be no more.

> Sleeper in death, undisturbed be thy rest
> Till Jesus bid thee rise,
> With the countless throng of good and blest,
> To meet him in the skies.
> Though tears of sorrow fill our cup,
> As o'er the grave we weep,
> Yet not as those who have no hope,
> For Christ in death did sleep.
> But death no more his form can bind,
> Its chains be now defies;
> And all in Him who sleep, he'll find,
> He knoweth them that are his.

Funeral attended by the writer. Discourse from the words selected by the deceased. "The Lord knoweth them that are his." 2 Tim. 2. 19. WM. A. FENN.

Died, in Hinsdale, N. H., of consumption, Nov. 25th, 1861, Sr. PERHAM, aged 52 years.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—My dear companion has gone to the grave. She sweetly fell asleep in Jesus, after a lingering illness, of consumption, which lasted over eighteen months. In her life she was a true pattern of virtue, very conscientious, and loved the dear Savior and his cause. She was a great sufferer for a few of the last weeks of her life; but her suffering is over, and she will remain silent in the grave till Gabriel's trump shall summon forth the dead in Christ, when I expect to meet her with all the saints, arrayed in immortal beauty, to reign forever with Christ in his kingdom. FOREIGN NEWS.

FOUR DAYS LATER.

By the arrival of the Africa we have news from Liverpool to the 24th inst.

Continental news is generally unimportant.

The Italian Parliament had been opened. Ricasoli presented his project for the settlement of the Roman question.

A reduction of from 80,000 to 100,000 men is spoken of in the French army. The men are to return home on a furlough of one year.

It is reported that the Minister of the French Marine declares that he cannot agree to a single centime reduction in his department.

Gen. Cialdini had arrived in Paris.

The preliminary elections in Prussia favor the Liberals.

The utmost activity prevails in the Italian naval department.

Additional facilities had been granted by France for the naturalization of foreign built ships. It is believed that no disarmament can take place in France. The Paris Bourse was firm.

At the opening of the Italian Chambers Ricasoli explained the state of the Roman question and the arrangement proposed. Nothing had as yet been accomplished.

Fuad Pasha had been appointed Grand Vizier of Turkey. Ali Pasha is Foreign Minister. The Porte consents to the union of the Danubian Principalities during the life of Prince Couza.

RAGUSA, Nov. 24. An official dispatch states that Omar Pasha, with eight batteries, defeated 8000 insurgents near Piva, after fighting four hours, with a loss of 800 killed and wounded. A numerous body of insurgent Montenegrins, who intended to invade Kaloshire, was repulsed after a bloody fight.

THE MEXICAN EXPEDITION.—The Liverpool Mercury says:—"The French squadron sent to Mexico consists of fifteen war-steamers, ranging from ninety to two guns, and of three advice-boats on the station, forming a total of 6000 horse-power, 330 guns, and 5000 sailors. The troops on board amount to 3500 men of all arms. The Spanish land force will be much larger. At the date of the last advices received in Madrid from Havana, (Oct. 16,) six or seven vessels of war and steam transports were shortly to leave for Vera Cruz with 6000 infantry, a brigade of artillery, a squadron of cavalry, and a battery composed of 12 guns. They were to carry every thing necessary for a landing, which was considered to be an inevitable measure."

The Times says the British naval force will consist of 850 guns and 10,000 seamen and marines—all of them, however, not designed to act against the Mexicans.

The Madrid Espana says:—"In political circles the project of forming in America a confederation of all the Republics of Spanish origin, with Spain at the head of it, is now being discussed. Such a measure, it is affirmed, would possess great advantages, both for Spain and for those little States."

DOMESTIC NEWS.

New York, Dec. 3. The Tribune's Washington dispatch says that a most important order will soon be issued from headquarters, informing the Governors of several free States that no more regiments, battalions or independent companies must be raised or received by them, except upon requisition of the War Department.

Southern papers are advocating an abolition of the elective franchise.

Latest advices from Pensacola represent that the fight has not been renewed. Accounts say that had the fight continued Fort McRae would have been destroyed. No particulars of the affair are given. The planters throughout the Southern seaboard are represented to be destroying their crops lest they should fall into the hands of the Yankees.

A conspiracy of Union men in New Orleans has been discovered, which has caused many arrests and great excitement.

Washington, Nov. 28. Every thing indicates that soon there is to be a demonstration on the Virginia side of the Potomac that will bring matters to a point. To-night is a dark and rainy one and most uncomfortable to be exposed in, but to my positive knowledge there have ten thousand troops crossed from this side to the Virginia side. For the last hour and a half an immense wagon train has been following them, loaded to the utmost capacity.—Cor. Boston Journal.

New York, Dec. 5. The Savannah Republican of the 2d inst. says the Unionists have evacuated Tybee Island. One ship load left on Saturday. On Saturday afternoon a large ship stood in for Warsaw Inlet. Com. Tatnall's fleet went after her, but she disappeared. There were six Union vessels off Tybee Island yesterday.

Intelligence from Charleston says the blockade there is constantly violated by inland channels to Edisto, and that the Moffit or North channel vessels are certain of 12 feet of water in the latter. Within a few weeks brig West Indian and barque Helen, with naval stores, and the schooner Gen. Ripley, with rice, have arrived, besides others of less note. The steamer Isabel is thoroughly fitted up and loaded with 1000 bales of cotton; also the Prince of Wales. They are waiting for an opportunity to run out.

There are about 15,000 [illegible] South Carolina and Georgia troops on the railroad to Savannah, and 5000 in Charleston. Most of the South Carolina regiments are still in Virginia. Five gunboats are building at Charleston. They are confident at Charleston that they can gather forces enough to meet us at any point on the main land we may choose. The Bermuda brought 3000 guns, of which Charleston got half. The Fingal brought 12,500 Enfield rifles. Percussion caps and rifled cannon were making at Charleston, and other military equipments were abundant. Provisions are said to be abundant and cheap.

Charleston, Nov. 30, via. Memphis and Cairo. Patriotic planters on the seaboard are hourly applying the torch to their crops of cotton and rice. Along the coast there is one sheet of flame and smoke.

Many military companies in New Orleans are volunteering for thirty days' service at Columbus, Ky.

Cairo, Ill., Dec. 5. A special dispatch to the Memphis papers of the 2d, gives an account of a great battle at Morristown, East Tennessee, between the Federal forces under Parson Brownlow and the rebels, which was fought on the 1st inst. The Parson's forces were victorious. The rebel dispatch calls it the first Union victory of the war. Brownlow had 3000 men. The rebel force was not ascertained. The rout of the rebels was total.

The Memphis Avalanche of the 2d contains the following: A large body of Unionists attacked the Confederate forces at Morristown, East Tennessee, yesterday, killing a large number and completely routing them.

Major Gen. George Crittenden has arrived at Knoxville to take command of the Confederate forces.

The Memphis Avalanche also states that Gen. Raines had cut Montgomery's forces to pieces, taking Montgomery a prisoner.

Ben. McCulloch had surrounded General Sigel at Sedalia, and it was believed the latter would be forced to surrender or be cut to pieces.

New York, Dec. 6. A letter from Port Royal says the 79th regiment made a reconnoissance toward Charleston, capturing three batteries and spiking three guns, and returned after having approached within 20 miles of Charleston.

Baltimore, Dec. 6. A dispatch from Savannah, dated the 4th inst., in yesterday's Richmond papers, says, "Sixteen Federal ships are inside the bar, and an attack on Fort Pulaski is hourly expected."

Washington, Dec. 8. Scouts sent out from Gen. Wadsworth's brigade on Friday returned to-day. They report that Flint Hall and also Fairfax Court House are entirely deserted by the rebel pickets. They passed through and beyond the village of Fairfax before they met the pickets of the enemy.

A dispatch from Richmond says a grand demonstration will be made on York river by the Unionists, to weaken the Potomac line.

IMPORTANT FROM RICHMOND.—Intense Excitement of the Federal Successes.—The N. Y. Times' Washington correspondent furnishes the following interesting statement, which was briefly spoken of in our yesterday's despatches.—Boston Journal.

"To-night (Sunday last) a gentleman who left Richmond on Wednesday last arrived in this city. He brings important intelligence relative to the state of public feeling South, and as his opportunities for observation have been excellent, his information is regarded as trustworthy. So well was he confided in by the people of Richmond, that over one hundred and fifty letters for persons in the North were given him to deliver, and these he very properly turned over to the government. He states that the most intense excitement prevails in Richmond and throughout the South, owing to our naval expeditions. Our success at Hilton Head and Bay Point, which were regarded the most formidable that had been constructed upon the coast, filled the Cotton States with dismay, and they had abandoned their coast defenses, and the people were calling upon the Governors of the States to withdraw their troops now in Virginia, that they might return South and prevent the Yankees from marching into the interior. The result of this state of public feeling, which has become known to the troops in Virginia, had been to cause insubordination and mutiny wherever the Southern troops were, and to such an extent had the mutiny proceeded about Richmond, Yorktown and Manassas, that Davis and Benjamin had been compelled to give the most positive assurances to the soldiers that if they would cease their rebellion a sufficient number should be sent South to drive the Yankees from their soil. With this assurance the men had again become quiet. Between the people of Richmond and the rebel Executive and Congress the most bitter feeling had been engendered, when Congress decided to remove the capital to Nashville. The troops and politicians from the Cotton States were loud in their denunciations of Virginia, and openly expressed themselves willing to allow Yankees to take the State, that it was barren and cold, without transportation; that to remain during the winter was utter ruin to them. The people and troops were in constant apprehension of an attack along their whole Potomac line, and this fear has increased now that a large force has left for the Cotton States. They were especially apprehensive of a movement against them below Occoquan. The news from Savannah and Pensacola had increased the panic, and he expresses the opinion that already Virginia is half conquered without the firing of a gun."

DOINGS IN CONGRESS.—Mr. Eliott, of Massachusetts, offered the following:—

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America—First. That in behalf of the people of these States we do solemnly declare that the war in which we are now engaged against the insurgent bodies now in arms against the government has for its object the suppression of such rebellion, and the re-establishment of the rightful authority of the national Constitution and laws over the entire extent of our common country. Second. That while we disclaim all power under the Constitution to interfere by ordinary legislation with the institutions of the several States, yet the war now existing must be conducted according to the usages and rights of military service, and during its continuance, the recognized authority of the maxim, that the safety of the State is the highest law, subordinates the right of property and dominates over civil relations. Third. That therefore we do hereby declare that in our judgment the President of the United States, as the Commander-in-Chief of our army, and the officers in command under him, have the right to emancipate all persons held as slaves in any military district in a state of insurrection against the national government; and that we respectfully advise that such order of emancipation be issued whenever the same will avail to weaken the power of the rebels in arms, or to strengthen the military power of the loyal forces.

ITEMS.

☞ The number of slain in wars since the commencement of the race, was estimated by Edmund Burke to amount to the almost inconceivable sum of thirty-five billions.

☞ The Navy Department has purchased two hundred and twenty vessels since Congress adjourned, and still has not enough for the necessities of the service.

☞ A clergyman in New York, recently preached to prove that the present war, with all its horrors, was undoubtedly a great blessing to the American people, and made a pretty strong case of it, but when he came to the closing prayer, no one could doubt the sincerity of his petition that "this great national calamity may come to an honorable and speedy termination." It was clear enough that the orator thought there might be "too much of a good thing," after all.

☞ The sleighing is said to be superb over nearly the whole of the States of Maine and Vermont, and a large portion of New Hampshire, but no snow in Boston.

For the Crisis.

Lines.

We have heard of a Savior, we have heard and believe,
That he once suffered sorrow and care,
That he offered his life as a ransom to give,
That we his own glory might share.
We have heard that he freely shed his blood on the cross,
To redeem us from sin and disgrace;
That he's gone to prepare us a mansion of rest,
And we long to behold his glad face.

We have heard of a land that ne'er groans 'neath a curse,
That the righteous shall safely dwell there;
A land that e'er yieldeth the richest increase,
All free from temptation and care.
We have heard that no sin and no death enter there
To disturb the pure joy of the place,
That the perfume of flowers e'er ladeth the air,
And we're longing that land to possess.

We have heard of a city whose streets are pure gold,
Whose walls are the richest of stone,
Whose twelve pearly gates will widely unfold
When are gathered the purified ones.
We have heard that the river of life floweth there,
That the glory of God is the light;
And we long to behold the beloved city fair,
To dwell there with angels in white.

We have heard of a crown that's awaiting each one
Who is longing for Christ to appear;
Of the victor's bright palm when the conquest is won,
And we welcome eternity here.
We have heard of the harps of gold, and we long
To swell the loud chorus of praise,
To pour forth in triumph the conqueror's song,
To join in the seraph's glad lays.

For the Crisis.

A Confession.

It is known by many that, for a long time, I have contended strenuously against church organization; and I wish to say, through the Crisis, that though I was conscientious in so doing, yet I have for certain reasons changed my mind in some respects. My reasons are as follows:—

First, we are obligated to obey the precepts of the gospel, both as individuals and as churches; and if we are occupying a position that prevents us from doing so, we should ascertain the right position and take it.

Second, Jesus commands, in Matt. 18: 15 18, —"Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be to thee as an heathen man and a publican. Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." This shows the necessity both of spirituality and strictness of discipline in the church.

Third, The Apostle Paul, in 2 Thess. 3: 6, says, "Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us." Now I am satisfied that this cannot be done, without some form of church government; and the plan which we in Pawlings have adopted, and have been trying for some time past, and which works beautifully, will probably be seen in the Crisis, as recommended by the Conference lately assembled at this place.

Fourth, The same Apostle commands in 1 Cor. 5: 11–13, "But this is what I wrote to you, that ye commingle not, if any one is called a brother, and is a whoremonger, or avaricious, or an idol-worshipper, or a railer, or a drunkard, or rapacious,—with him who is such, not even to eat bread. For what business have I to judge them who are without? But those within the body, judge ye, and those without God judgeth, and remove ye the wicked person from among you."—Syriac.

Fifth, 2 Cor. 6: 14–18—"And be ye not yoke-fellows with them that believe not: for what fellowship hath righteousness with iniquity? or what communion hath light with darkness? or what concord hath the Messiah with Satan? or what part hath a believer with an unbeliever? or what agreement hath the temple of God with that of demons? For ye are the temple of the living God; as it is said, I will dwell among them, and walk among them, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore, come ye out from among them, saith the Lord; and come not near the unclean thing, and I will receive you; and will be to you a Father, and ye shall be sons and daughters to me saith the Lord Almighty."—Syriac. Now in my view of the subject, the great object of gospel order is to keep the wicked out of the church, and thus have a pure church; but it seems to me that some fail to see this. I do not believe in compacting every thing together to get a great church, but in laboring for a good one.

Sixth, Jesus says (Matt. 5: 13,) "Ye are the salt of the earth; but if the salt have lost its savor, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out and to be trodden under foot of men." Hence, I conclude that a church filled up with unrighteous people is worse than none.

Seventh, The Lord has, in the past, held the church responsible for its wickedness; and he required us to purge out the old leaven, which is hypocrisy, malice, or wickedness. I do not believe in covenants without discipline; though I discard creeds. I do not believe in appointing men to office in the church because they are rich, or smart, nor because they will make a fuss if they are not appointed. (The latter ought to be out of the church any way.) But good and holy men, men that are rich in faith, though they may be poor in this world, or a shade darker than some others. O for a pure church! The Lord help us to labor for this end.

Sketch of Travels.

I will just give a passing notice of a few items of labors during the past year, in my pilgrimage to Mount Zion. I have been too ill to travel much for many months, and am now laid by entirely, with a diseased spine, hoping for perfect soundness of body and mind when the Lord comes.

During the latter part of last winter I visited Waterford and Stoneham, Me., spent several weeks, held some very profitable meetings, found some of the Lord's children active, others asleep; fed them with the word of life, and saw some symptoms of life among the sleepers. In April, I visited Lewiston, hired a Hall, advertised meetings, and, in company with Brn. York and Fassett, labored five days against wind and tide. Found several brethren and sisters who truly sympathized with us in our work, but who have become discouraged, and do not think of trying to keep a lamp burning in that populous, proud, and sinful place. A goodly number attended, and heard gladly. Some of the believers were much refreshed; some disciples seemed to be ready to learn the gospel more perfectly. The Spiritualists kicked, and gave a challenge for discussion. It was accepted, terms settled, and time appointed.

We held some very interesting meetings in Auburn; found an ear to hear the "gospel of the kingdom," and "signs of the times." There are several there whose faith grows exceedingly. I hope some Apollos will water the seed there.

At the time for the discussion, Mr. G. W. Stebbins, of N. Y., and Bro. J. Hemenway, of Clinton, took the stand—Stebbins for Spiritualism, Hemenway for the Bible. The contest lasted four evenings. I only heard the last, which proved a glorious triumph of God's word over the errors of rap-ology. I have hoped to see a full report of that discussion.

During May and June, I was laid by mostly. Only attended one quarterly Conference, and one meeting at home, assisting in the ordination of Bro. H. D. Read. In July, I so far recruited as to visit Stoneham and Lovell, with Eld. E. M. Haggett, two invalids; but the Lord was with us, and gave us a precious season. The twelve meetings we held were not in vain. We found faith among the Lord's flock.

On the 4th of July, we "celebrated" in a large barn in Lovell, preaching the free gospel, offering freedom from sin, freedom from mortality, and all its train of evils, when Jesus comes to give his people a free pass into his everlasting kingdom. Five happy souls were baptized, who had found this blessed hope in the Lord. Truly the word of God is a lamp to our feet; it shines among the people. Some will believe and obey. Blessed be God. We found a number in that back part of the country, among the rugged mountains, and almost away from all society, who believe the gospel, and look, and long, and pray for Jesus' coming.

I came home ill, not able to move much for some time; but having a call from Albion,—"Come over and help us," in August I started to go and baptize a brother, who had taken hold of the word of God. He wanted some one to baptize him "who preached the gospel hope." So this gave me a chance to talk for the Lord, and declare his word. Had a precious time—baptized the brother, and left him to go on his way rejoicing.

In September, I was able to go to Bristol and preach to the little flock there. They are weary, and too inactive; not weary by too much work for God, but weary of the present state of society, and seem desirous for the Lord to come and change the earth and all things therein, and give the day of rest. But they need more of the working spirit. We must work for God, if we would grow in grace.

Scarcely able to ride, I attended our "State Annual Conference," in Yarmouth. The Lord signally blessed this gathering. It was the most cheering and healthful meeting, all things considered, I ever attended in Maine. I returned too lame to travel, but felt not fully submissive to lie by. There is much to be done. I feel the need of grace to enable me to be glad to be in whatever circumstance God wills, or permits.

In Oct., I attended the Worcester Convention. There I met many old friends, with whom I had formerly associated, and formed happy acquaintance with some brethren of whom I had only read or heard. It is pleasant indeed to meet them here, but it will be a better meeting, if we meet in the coming, immortal kingdom of God.

Returning, I attended a call to preach a funeral discourse in Albion, on the death of the only son of Bro. J. Carr. Then went to Liberty, to consult my physician, and obtain medical treatment. Here the door being open, I preached two discourses, waking up an interest with several who had not heard any such preaching since 1843. They wished me to stop and spend the week with them; but I could not, owing to ill health. This was formerly a battle-field, (in 1843,) where many embraced the faith and hope. Most have moved away; some sleep in death; others have become inactive, but wish to be fed and nourished. Bro. J. W. Mitchell, M. D., resides there now, and I hope he will improve the gift in him, to sow the word. I returned home with advice to lie entirely by for months to come. I perhaps did not need that advice, for, with a huge seton in my back, and too lame to ride or walk with any degree of pleasure, I feel obliged to be quiet.

Besides the above meetings, I have attended others, as I was able to get about, yet I have done but little. May the Lord, who is able to do above what we can ask, or even think, heal my body, that I may be able to go out and labor for the salvation of perishing souls. The signs indicate that the Lord of the vineyard is soon to come. All our labor will soon be over. The war spirit is absorbing the minds of the masses,—ministers and people. How needful that all God's ministers have "on the whole armor," and give the trump a certain sound. Yours in the blessed hope of seeing Jesus soon. I. C. WELLCOME.

Going Home.

AIR.—"Speed away."

Going home, going home, when time shall be o'er,
To Canaan, bright Canaan, where death comes no more;
Where peace like a river flows gently along,
And millions immortal shall sing the new song:
Where tears cease to flow—the pilgrim to roam,—
Going home, going home, going home.

Going home, going home, when toils are all past,
The pilgrim has entered into glory at last;
Where all are made beauteous, and sparkling and bright,
And dwell in the city of splendor and light.
With patience we'll wait till the kingdom shall come,
Going home, going home, going home.

Going home, going home to inherit the land
With saints of all ages, the dear deathless band;
The friend from us parted shall greet us again,
To Zion they'll come, and with Jesus they'll reign.
Let weeping endure for a night, joy shall come,
Going home, going home, going home.

Going home, going home, and there shall I rest
In mansions prepared for the good and the blest;
No sickness can reach me, no wearisome hours,
With youth everlasting I'll roam Eden's bowers.
Rejoice, saints, rejoice, deliverance will come,
Going home, going home, going home.

Going home, going home, ye homeless ones, sing;
We soon shall behold Him, our heavenly King;
Already a light may be seen in the skies,
The night is fast fleeting, the day-star shall rise;
The trump soon will sound, the dead forth shall come,
Going home, going home, going home.

Meeting at Livermore.

The three days meeting at Livermore, Me., commenced, as appointed, on Thursday evening, Nov. 7th, and continued over Sunday. The weather not forbidding, there was an encouraging attendance throughout from the community, and a fair representation of brethren from abroad. Some brethren, who are young in the faith, came thirty miles to attend the meeting. They came, as among strangers, with doubts and fears, but they parted as from friends, reluctantly severing the cords of sweet associations and mutual cheer, but hoping soon to enjoy those ties unbroken,

"Where no farewell tear is shed."

Thursday evening, the writer spoke from Matt. 13: 14, and was followed by other brethren, on the straightness of the gate, and narrowness of the way which leads to life.

Friday morning, met for a prayer meeting at 10 1-2 o'clock, continuing till noon. The exercises seemed bound as by a spell at first, but soon the clouds broke, and we had a melting time. In the afternoon, Bro. Howard spoke from 2 Cor. 11: 2,—a cheering and strengthening discourse. In the evening he spoke from Heb. 9: 28, showing the theory of the atonement, and its bearing on the life and death question. It was a profitable discourse. It was especially cheering to find his affliction so far departing, as to suffer him to enter into the work of the Lord with nearly as much earnestness as formerly.

Saturday morning, met at 9 o'clock for a love feast, and continued till noon. Afternoon, the writer spoke from John 15: 18, 19, showing what it is to come out from the world, and how they will treat us if we abandon them and their ways. Evening, Bro. Seavey spoke from Rev. 21: 7, showing that we have something to overcome, and that such shall inherit all things. He was followed by Bro. Howard in some good thoughts on the new earth.

Sunday morning, met for a prayer meeting at 9 o'clock, continuing till half past ten, when Bro. Howard gave us an able discourse from Matt. 27: 30. Afternoon, the services commenced by the ordination of the writer—Brn. Howard, Haggett and Hanscomb performing the service. We then listened to a short discourse from Bro. Seavey, on Acts 26: 18, after which we proceeded to the river, when a worthy brother was baptized, to the relief of his conscience; for his "pouring" in earlier years did not with him answer a good conscience toward God, when he learned that God never authorized such a baptism. In the evening, we listened to a discourse on the signs of the times, by Bro. Howard, from Matt. 16: 3, showing that the great plan of salvation is near its consummation.

Thus closed a meeting which, everything considered, is the most successful I have attended for the season. I thought the Poland conference, held in June, an excellent meeting. I regarded the conference at Yarmouth equally as good. The Wayne conference I thought better than either; but this I esteem the best of all. When the meeting was first proposed, its prospects seemed mingled as much with fear as hope; but its results have proved, by the blessing of God, every way encouraging. Brethren were encouraged, strengthened and united; backsliders chided themselves for their wanderings; sinners were attentive, and deeply impressed that these things are so; while the cause in that place received an impulse which will not soon be forgotten. I. K. LOMBARD.

For the Crisis.

Suggestions.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—I am thoroughly convinced of two things; viz.:—

1st. We, as a people, put forth too little direct effort for the conversion of sinners. Theorizing occupies too prominent a position in our public labors. Oh! that the reformation spirit might burn more brilliantly in the hearts of our ministers.

2nd. We, as a people, do not make the doctrine of the immediate coming of Christ prominent. Too much time is spent in inventing or propagating some new dogma, which, to say the least, is not "meat in due season." Shall our time all run to waste while we stop to hear, or to tell, some new thing? Our commission is to invite sinners to Christ. Let us do it feelingly, zealously and constantly. The great dispensational truth, which has been reserved for us to proclaim in the ears of a slumbering church and a guilty world, is the immediate coming of the heavenly Bridegroom. Shall our lips be sealed upon this great question? Shall we hold it as a topic of meagre importance? Shall we be half hearted in our attempts to break the slumbers of the mass? Shall we allow other topics of a less interesting nature, and of no vital importance in saving sinners, to claim the large share of our minds and energies?

[The above are important suggestions, and should receive careful attention.—G.]

An Address,

To the Churches within the limits of the Eastern New York, Western Massachusetts and Connecticut Second Advent Conference.

Whereas: we have in times past labored upon our own responsibility, without any definite understanding with each other as preachers and churches; and feeling a necessity of a mutual co-operation, in which the ministry and churches can the more effectually accomplish the work assigned us, as co-workers with the great Head of the church; and, whereas, there has been no system or order to govern the preacher, or lay-member, or bring them to trial in case any of them should depart from the way of life and (after laboring with them as the gospel directs,) do as the Apostle says, "Put away from among yourselves that wicked person."

And, whereas, we have seen the evil that has grown out of no order or system among us, we therefore resolved, at the camp meeting held at Dover, N. Y., Sept. 14th, 1861, to organize ourselves into a conference. And in doing this, we do not propose to establish a monopoly, or to enforce any system or rule of action, but to recommend for the consideration of the churches a system of "gospel order;" and we believe that that order has been extensively overlooked by the church, and some of our best brethren are prejudiced against any system of organic order, mainly because the power in such bodies has been abused.

We therefore propose a gospel platform, and adopt such rules as shall regulate, and govern us, according to the word of God.

The object of this conference will be seen in the following, which is the preamble in our constitution:

"The object of this conference is to concentrate the labors and sympathies of the preachers and churches within its limits, for the effectual spread of the truth, and to improve the moral conditon of the churches."

The object then is,—1st. "To concentrate the labors and sympathies of the preachers and churches," so as to labor in harmony with each other.

Preachers and churches, having an understanding with each other, can more effectually spread the truth.

We believe the condition of the churches generally, to be morally bad; and in order to improve their condition, we desire that the churches within the limits of this conference, should adopt a system of order, so as to co-operate with us. We would also propose that each church send a delegate to the quarterly conference, stating the condition of the church to which he belongs, and also make such arrangements as may be deemed necessary to supply the church with preaching.

GEORGE L. TEEPLE, Secretary,
Per order of the conference.

UNSPOKEN LANGUAGE.—How much expression can be given and exchanged by a grasp of the hand or a glance of the eye! An intercourse with those we regard bearing silent yet powerful evidence of that unspeakable love which exists in the depths of our nature, most eloquent when the tongue is silent. A warm pressure of the hand can be understood by all.

GOOD MEN.—It is necessary to bear ever in mind that to be great is not always to be good. A good man is always great, for there is a beautiful nobility in goodness; but a great man is not always a good man. You need go no further than the annals of history to learn this self-evident truism.

The Pruned Vine.

"Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit."—John 15: 2.

Do you wonder why repeated bereavements, losses, sufferings, befall you, till nearly all your life seems cut away? Go look at the vine dresser, as he cultivates his vine. For what purposes has he planted the tender shoot? That it may grow strong and sturdy and bring forth abundant fruit! Yet see him after the first year cut back nearly all its growth, and after the second year prune it down again, so year by year cutting it back, never leaving it to its own will in its luxuriance. Why is this? That its sap may be concentrated, its strength matured, its wild straggling exuberance restrained, and a compact growth of rich fruit be perfected. Has the vine bled in vain? Was not the pruner's knife a kindly one?

Eat of the wild grape of the fields, and then of the carefully pruned and cultivated fruit of the garden, and see if there did not concentrate sweetness after every wound.

Yet though Christ says, "I am the vine, and my Father is the husbandman. Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit," you wonder that you are wounded by God's afflictive hand! See you not that your happiness, your pleasures, your riches, your health, your affections, were the overabundant branches, by whose many clinging tendrils you were attaching yourself to weak earthly supports. Winding, climbing, clinging around these in free natural growth, all your use was lost. Your use in growth is not your own untrained development; it is to bring forth much fruit for the Master's hand.

Be rather thankful that you are not left as the wild vine, unworthy the pruner's knife.

It is the husbandman's mark of value that he sets upon you.

"Every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it." "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son that he receiveth. If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons; for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not? Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby."—Selected by S. Lawrence.

Anecdote Illustrative of Trust in God.

In a large, lonely house, situated in the south of England, there once lived a lady and her two maid servants. They were far away from all human habitations, but they seemed to have no fear, but to have dwelt there peacefully and happily. It was the lady's custom, with her maids to go round the house every evening to see if all the windows and doors were properly secured. One night she had accompanied them as usual and ascertained that all was safe. They left her in the passage close to her room, and then went to their own, which was quite at the outside of the house. As the lady opened the door, she distinctly saw a man under her bed. What could she do? Her servants were far away, and could not hear her if she screamed for help, and even if they had come to her assistance, these three weak women were no match for a desperate house-breaker. How then did she act? She put her trust in God. Quietly she closed the door, and locked it on the inside, which she was in the habit of doing. She then leisurely brushed her hair, and putting on her dressing-gown, she took her Bible and sat down to read. She read aloud, and chose a chapter that had peculiar reference to God's watchfulness over us, and constant care of us by night and by day. When it was finished she knelt and prayed at great length, still uttering her words aloud, especially commending herself and servants to God's protection, dwelling upon her utter helplessness, and dependence upon him to preserve them from all danger. At last she rose from her knees, put out her candle, and lay down in bed, but did not sleep. After a few minutes had elapsed she was conscious that the man was standing by her bed-side. He begged of her not to be alarmed, "I came here to rob you, but after the words you have read, the prayers you have uttered, no power on earth could induce me to hurt you, or touch a thing in your house. But you must remain perfectly quiet and not attempt to interfere with me. I shall now give a signal to my companions which they will understand, and then we will go away and you may sleep in peace, for I give you my solemn word no one shall harm you, and not the smallest thing belonging to you shall be disturbed." He then went to the window opened it, and whistled softly. Returning to the lady's side (who had not spoken or moved,) he said, "Now I am going. Your prayer has been heard, and no disaster will befall you." He left the room, and soon all was quiet, and the lady fell asleep, still upheld by that calm and beautiful faith and trust. When the morning dawned, and she awoke, we may feel sure she poured out her thanksgiving and praises to him who had "defended" her "under his wing," and "kept" her "safe under his feathers," so that she was not "afraid of any terror by night." The man was true to his word, and not a thing in the house had been taken. Oh, shall we not hope that his heart was changed from that day forth, and that he forsook his course, and cried to that Savior "who came to seek and to save that which is lost," even on the cross did not reject the penitent thief. From this story let us learn to put our whole trust and confidence in God. The lady's courage was indeed wonderful, but the Lord was her defence upon her right hand, and "with him all things are possible."

ADDITIONAL.

We have received an extract from a letter fully corroborating the remarkable anecdote of the lady and the robber, in our October number, and adding some facts that embrace the wonder and mercy of her escape. We quote the words of the letter:—"In the first place the robber told her that if she had given the slightest alarm or token of resistance, he had fully determined to murder her; so that it was God's good guidance that told her to take the course she took. Then before he went away, he said, 'I must have the book you read out of,' and carried off her Bible, willingly enough given you may be sure. This happened many years ago, and only comparatively recently did the lady hear any more of him. She was attending a religious meeting in Yorkshire, where after several noted clergy and others had spoken, a man arose, saying he was one of the book hawkers of the society, and told the story of the midnight adventure as a testimony of the word of God. He concluded, 'I was that man.' The lady rose from her seat in the hall, and said quietly, 'It is all quite true, I was that lady,' and sat down again."—London Packet.

Independence.

Ye speak of independence—
There is no such thing on earth—
We depend upon each other
Still for all that life is worth!
To every mind that ponders,
To every heart that feels,
There's not a day but something
This hidden truth reveals!

The seed of friendship blooms not—
No leaf can it impart,
Until it finds a welcome
In some congenial heart!
The light of love can warm not
Till found some kindred shrine,
And then it springs immortal,
And shows itself divine.

Thus—thus, throughout creation,
The links of life had birth;
Ye speak of independence—
There is no such thing on earth!
We depend on one another
For each comfort we enjoy;
There is nought the heart can foster
That the heart may not destroy!

We depend for our existence
On His hand who gave us breath;
We depend upon affection
E'en to soothe the hour of death.
Thus—thus, throughout creation,
The links of life had birth;
Ye speak of independence—
There's no such thing on earth!

The stars which have least circuit are nearest the pole; and men who are least perplexed with business, are commonly nearest to God.

He that fights against Satan, in the strength of his own resolutions, constitution, or education, will certainly fly and fall before him; Satan will be too hard for such a soul, and lead him captive at his pleasure. The only way to stand, conquer, and triumph, is still to plead, "It is written," as Christ did. There is no sword but the two-edged sword of the Spirit, that will be found to be mettle of proof when a soul comes to engage against Satan.

Hard weather tries what health we have. Withered leaves soon fall off in windy weather; rotten boughs quickly break with heavy weights.

Hearty Suppers.

A case was recently stated in this Journal, in which a clergyman rode from breakfast until night, without eating any thing. Weary and hungry, he ate a very hearty meal and retired to bed. During the night he was taken ill, fell at once into a stupor, and in that condition died next day. In another instance, under our own observation, a person in as apparent good health as at any time during the fifty years preceding, was attacked with lung-fever, in consequence of hearty eating in the latter part of the afternoon, and died in three days. Usually, late and hearty suppers cause diarrhea, cholera, cramp-colic, and similar forms of disease, but in many cases their ill-effects are manifested in ways little suspected; hence they often get off with less than their share of blame. It is useful, therefore, to give some of their more uncommon results, this may lead a few of the wiser sort to adopt from principle, as a wise precaution, the safe, advantageous and rational practice of eating nothing later than the mid-day meal, beyond a piece of cold bread and butter, adding, perhaps, not a glass of cold water, but what is better, a single teacupful of any hot drink. Lung-fever, inflamation of the lungs, and pneumonia, mean precisely the same thing, "Lung fever" being plain old Anglo-Saxon. The patient ate very heartily indeed, late in the after-part of the day, and waked up in the night with a severe chill, which shook the body like an aspen, and lasted for more than an hour; then came vomiting of bile, and looseness of bowels, and a little cough; these all suddenly ceased, and the patient sank rapidly into the grave, at the age of seventy-five. The lungs of this person had been so weak at the early age of twenty-two, that it was freely prophesied, that life could not last another year.

When any thing is eaten, extra blood and heat go to the stomach to carry on the work of digestion, and this process ceases the instant the temperature is below nature's standard. An extra meal requires extra digestive power and extra heat; the blood is called in from the outposts, and so is the heat, to assist the stomach in its unusual labor; that leaves the surface, the skin, the feet, the fingers, cold. Has the reader never felt chills run over the body in getting up from a hearty meal? A greater degree of that would be a "regular shake." Now the lungs are in direct sympathy with the skin, hence the chill of the skin is often transferred to the lungs. In the case in question, the effects of the chill fell on the lungs, they being the weaker part, the chill of the skin drove all the blood inwards and congested it, heaped it on the incapable, the weak, the helpless lungs; as proof, the patient spat blood, a mouthful or less. It was nature's effort to get rid of the terrible load; if she had been able to clear herself of half a tea-cupful or more, the patient would have been saved, but there was not constitutional strength enough to make the effort; the clockwork of life had run so long, that all its wheels had pretty nearly worn out together, so that there was not power sufficient to overcome the obstacle of a pin-head, as it were. The main lesson of the article is, that eating heartily, late in the day, is always hurtful, sometimes dangerous and even fatal. And further, that safety in the old and the feeble consists in habitually guarding against even slight exposures, slight changes in any of the habits and practices of life, eating and drinking and exercising in the greatest moderation, being systematic and uniform in all things.—Hall's Journal of Health.

"Light Necessary to Health."

Our correspondent, Mrs. C. M. C., of Brooklyn, will please reflect upon the following: As an instance of the value of sunlight, Dupuytren, the celebrated physician, mentions the case of a French lady, whose disease baffled the skill of the most eminent men. This lady resided in a dark room, in which the sun never shone, in one of the narrow streets of Paris. After a careful examination, he was led to refer her complaint to the absence of light, and caused her to be removed to a more cheerful situation. The change was attended with the most beneficial results; all her complaints vanished. It is remarkable that Lavoisier, writing in the last century, should have placed light, as an agent of health, even before pure air. In fact, where you can obtain abundance of light, it is also generally possible to obtain a similar change of fresh air. In England a similar thing occurs; invalids are almost always shut up in close rooms, curtains drawn, and light excluded, to their serious disadvantage. Sunlight is more vivifying than any physic.—Herald of Progress.

COLD BATHING.—Several of my readers inform me they have undertaken recently, a daily morning bath, and add that they look forward with dread to the approaching cold season. One asks, "how can I bathe, standing all nude, in water freezing cold?"

Certain it is, a bath is more needed in winter than in summer. During the warm season the perspiration keeps the pores open, while in winter they are closed, and nothing but bathing and friction will open them.

If the water be applied with great rapidity, and the friction with rough towels or brushes be rapid and vigorous, few persons will be depressed with an atmosphere below zero, and ice water. Occasionally a feeble woman cannot endure the exposure, and should use warm water in a warm room. But all must, during cold weather, bathe frequently and rub the skin hard.—Lewis' Gymnastics.

TOBACCO.—"A desire is excited," says Dr. Rush, "by tobacco for strong drinks, and these lead to drunkenness." "Chewing and smoking tobacco," says Dr. Stephenson, "exhausts the salivary glands, producing dryness and thirst. Hence, after the use of a cigar and the quid, brandy, whisky, or some other spirit is called for." Dr. Woodward says, "I have supposed that tobacco was the most common stepping-stone to that use of spirituous liquors which leads to intemperance." "Smoking," says Dr. Muzzey, "produces a huskiness of the mouth, which calls for some liquid; hence the kindred habits of smoking and drinking." Hosts of others, whose words should be law, proclaim the same doctrine.—Independent.

☞ Swine's flesh is the worst of meats. God told the Jews not to touch pork, because he knew pork was bad for them. And I echo the voice of my profession from almost every civilized country when I say that this immense use of the flesh of the swine is filling all christendom with salt-rheum, erysipelas, scrofula and other evil humors. And all this is more emphatically true when the animal is fattened in a close pen without exercise, and stuffed with every conceivable kind of food. Mutton is without doubt the healthiest meat, especially if eaten cold. Beef and fowls are good. Fresh fish is excellent if taken at the right season. Salted cod fish, if well freshened is good.—Lewis' New Gymnastics.

☞ "Temperance," says Dr. Franklin, "puts wood on the fire, meal in the barrel, flour in the tub, money in the purse, credit in the country, contentment in the house, clothes on the bairns, vigor in the body, intelligence in the brain, and spirit in the whole constitution."

☞ A distinguished physician, who died some years since in Paris, declared, "I believe that during the twenty-six years I have practiced my profession in this city, 20,000 children have been carried to the cemeteries a sacrifice to the absurd custom of exposing their arms and necks."

"But the greatest of these is Charity."

BY VESTA H. CUDWORTH.

Since first on Calvary's mountain
I saw by faith the accursed tree,
Bathed in life's crimson fountain,
So freely shed by Christ for me;
His blessed spirit lingers
Around my pathway night and day,
And ever softly whispers
Bravely for others work and pray.

Go seek that lone heart bleeding,
For mark! how deep the careless feet
Have bruised and left unheeding:
Go bind, and freely with it weep,
Point them to a friend in heaven,
Tell them Gilead's balm is free:
Help bear the heavy burthen,
They'll gem a sparkling crown for thee.

Go! when thy soul is breathing
Affluence' soft and balmy air,
And with the poor and grieving
Toil and sorrow kindly share.
Grudge not the gentle showers
That chance may fall on desert lands;
Scorn to bask amid the flowers,
While others walk the burning sands.

Then when the storm bursts 'round thee,
Thou shalt not toil unblest alone;
I'll point thee on to glory,
And teach thee cheering songs of home;
Where is the golden city,
A starry crown of joy is thine,
With gems of living beauty
Thou'st glean'd 'mid darkness, want and crime.

A SERMON.
The Science of Grafting; or, how Men got into the Christ.

BY R. V. LYON.

"Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."—2 Cor. 5 : 17.

Brutus once said, at the time his hands were about to be stained with the blood of Cæsar, "Not that we love Cæsar less, but Rome more!" It is not that we love our fellow-men less, but the word of God more, which leads us to differ from them upon the great fundamental doctrine of Christianity. Brutus and Cassius saw that Rome's liberties were in danger, and nothing short of Cæsar's death could save its inhabitants from perpetual slavery.

Thus it is with me. I see that the human family are under a spell-binding influence, which has been thrown around them by a class of men who claim to be preachers of the gospel, and who are teaching for the doctrine of the BIBLE, the commandments or traditions of men. And all this false teaching has grown out of the false statement which the Father of lies made to Eve in the garden, "Ye shall not surely die." Therefore the great mass are perfect slaves to a false theology, and nothing but an exposure of their false system, and a faithful exhibition of the things pertaining to the Christ, and the kingdom of God, can break this iron yoke of slavery which they are now wearing, and make them free in Christ, and joint heirs with him to the THRONE AND KINGDOM OF ISRAEL, which they are destined to share with him in the reign and glory of that kingdom.

Upon my entering this house, which is closely crowded with human beings, who are with me in the march, with more than lightning speed, to the judgment of the great day, where we must shortly stand before the Judge, to "pass the solemn test"; I have thought it would be well for me to select a text to discourse upon this evening upon which all of us can be agreed. For in union there is strength, and a three-fold cord is not easily broken. Subjects there are upon which some of us disagree; such as the soon coming of Jesus to reign personally on this earth, with all his saints over JUDAH AND ISRAEL, AND THE GENTILE NATIONS who are with them, to be on trial for immortality in the AGE TO COME;—the state of man in death;—the utter extermination of the effects of the FALL from the universe of God at the closing up of the age to come, and the introduction of that age which John in vision saw, when "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." Though many disagree upon these all-important truths, with some others that might be named; for instance, that Jesus is the Son of God, "Made of a woman, made under the law, [not only under the law which Adam had broken, but all law,] to redeem them that are under the law"; yet there is no chance for us to differ, if we will only make up our minds to believe that God has told the truth!

But upon this text, which I have selected, all will be agreed; because all of you admit that we must get into the Christ, in order to have our sins pardoned, and, at his coming and kingdom, come into possession of eternal life, and hear from his own lips the welcome invitation, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." "Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."

In discoursing upon this text, I shall try to show, (1.) How Gentiles are to get into Christ. (2.) I shall speak of some of the signs which are hung out around the dwelling of those who are in Christ,—"Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."

1. How are we to get into the Christ? An important question! A question which interests the Father, the Son, the Holy Spirit, and the angels which encircle the throne of the ETERNAL, and ought to interest us all, from the fact that we are mortal, and liable any hour to fall down under the power of death.

2. We are standing upon the last crumbling sands of time that belongs to this dispensation!

We will endeavor to answer the question by inquiring, in the first place, how the Jews, who were the natural branches of the good olive tree, were broken off? You answer in the language of Paul, "through unbelief." Now, this implies, that they ought to have believed. Paul testifies, Rom. 11 : 25, 28, that in consequence of unbelief, they were blind, as a nation, on that part of the prophetic word which graphically portrayed the sufferings of the Christ, his death, burial, resurrection, and ascension to his Father's right hand; there to remain as the antitype of the Aaronic priesthood, until Gentile rule shall end. Then, in the combined glory of all heaven, come to give life to all those who have embraced him as the Messiah. And at the same time, they firmly believed in those prophecies which predicted the restoration of the throne and kingdom to Israel, and that when Messiah should come, he would fulfill them. And because Jesus of Nazareth did not do it, they rejected him. Therefore they were broken off, that we poor Gentiles, who are of the wild olive tree, might be grafted into the good olive tree.

Here the Apostle refers to the science of grafting. The farmer wishes to improve his fruit; he makes his selection, then he cuts the scion from the tree, then prepares it to be set into the stump, which he has previously prepared to receive it; then the cement is put around it so as to keep the air and water out; and if all is rightly done, it lives and yields him much fruit.

Now we, who are of this wild olive tree, must be "cut off"—cut off from our sins,—before we can be engrafted into the good olive tree, which is the Lord Jesus Christ. How is this work of cutting off to be done? Is it to be done by believing in or embracing a false gospel? Nay! verily, this work can never be done, only as we have faith in the record which the Father has given of his Son, as being the way, the truth, and the life; the MEDIUM appointed by God, through which pardon and eternal life and the inheritance are to come to the children of the first Adam. (Therefore they must be mortal.) Faith in the record that speaks of His birth, His life, His death, His burial, His resurrection, and ascension to the Father's right hand, where he is to remain as the antitype of the Aaronic priesthood, until the Gentile rule shall end. Then in robes of royalty come to raise the righteous dead, incorruptible, and change the righteous living from mortality to immortality, and exalt them to the office of kings and priests, that they may be fully qualified to share with him in the reign and glory of his kingdom, which is the kingdom of David, the kingdom of Israel, according to the testimony of Gabriel, Isaiah, and Ezekiel.

Gabriel's testimony reads thus: Luke 1 : 30 33,—"And the Angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary; for thou hast found favor with God. And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a Son; and shalt call his name Jesus. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." Isa. 9 : 6, 7.—"For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his (David's) kingdom, to order it (David's kingdom), and to establish it (David's kingdom) with judgment and with justice, from henceforth; (from the time he shall take possession of it;) even for ever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Ezek. 21 : 25–27.—"And thou, profane, wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God; Remove the diadem, and take off his crown; this shall not be the same; exalt him that is low (Jesus), and abase him that is high (Zedekiah). I will overturn, overturn, overturn it (the throne and kingdom of Israel, or David); and it (the throne and kingdom of Israel) shall be no more, until he come (Jesus) whose right it (the throne and kingdom of Israel) is; and I (the Father) will give it (the throne and kingdom of Israel) him" (Jesus).

Faith in those prophecies, which predict the future gathering of Judah and Israel to their own land, and the new covenant being made with them, and they all knowing the Lord from the least of them to the greatest, and the reign of Christ and his saints over them and the Gentile nations, who are to be on trial for immortality for one thousand years previous to the finishing up of the great work of redemption, and the delivering up, on the part of Jesus, "the kingdom of God" (or the kingdom of David), that "He may be all in all"; and the ushering in of that age when the glory of God shall be like a molten sea and fill this entire earth; and all created intelligences in the wide universe of Jehovah be engaged in "saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever";—faith in this record (and the reader will remember, that faith is taking God at his word) will cut the sinner off from the wild olive tree unto which he belongs by nature, and bring him into a position where he will be led to see himself a fleshly, sinful, and ruined being, and exposed to the wrath of God, without a pardon from him, coming through Jesus Christ. This faith will lead him to repentance, (which will fit him to be set or inducted into the Christ, the good olive tree); which is a breaking off from sin by righteousness and turning unto the Lord, ceasing to do evil and learning to do well; a change of one's course of conduct, which has been sinful, to that which is holy; and in submitting to the ordinance of baptism, by a burial in the water, he is inducted into the Christ. Thereby he becomes a branch of the good olive tree, and draws nourishment from it. Henceforth he yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and his end will be "everlasting life." Gal. 3 : 27,—"For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." Rom. 6 : 3–5,—"Know ye not that so many of us as were baptized INTO Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore (for this reason) we are BURIED with him by baptism (immersion in water) into death; that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection."

His coming forth out of the water, after he has been buried beneath its swelling flood, is a sure token of his faith in the death, burial, and resurrection of the Son of God, and the law appointed by the great Head of the Church "for the remission of sins"; and a glorious type of the resurrection of the saints, at the appearing and kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. The whole man goes into the water, where he is under the power and dominion of another, but he comes forth. The whole man goes into the grave, where he is under the power and dominion of death; but in the morning of the resurrection he comes forth.

I say upon his coming up out of the water, all the promises that the Father has made to the willing and obedient through the Christ, which promises are "the gift of the Holy Spirit," are made over to him; upon them he feasts, and thereby he exhibits the fruits of one who is in the Christ; "old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new." Thus we see that faith in the record that God has given of his Son cuts the sinner off from the wild olive tree. (2.) Repentance prepares him to be set into the Christ, the good olive tree. (3.) Baptism by a burial in the water, brings him into the Christ. (4.) Upon his coming up out of the water, a garment of a four-fold thickness is thrown around him by the Father, to protect him against all the "wiles of the devil." 1 Cor. 1 : 30, 31,—"But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us WISDOM, and RIGHTEOUSNESS, and SANCTIFICATION, and REDEMPTION; that according as it is written, he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." And you might as well undertake to chain the forked lightning, or drown the noise of the rumbling thunder, as to prevent him from walking the highway of holiness.

(To be concluded.)

For the Crisis.

To-day Jesus calls You!

To-day Jesus calls you! O sinner, come home,
He waits to receive you, the Spirit says come;
Acknowledge your Savior, oh, kneel at his feet,
And find in his mercy a peaceful retreat.

To-day Jesus calls you! oh, list to his voice,
His blood was shed for you, make wisdom your choice;
To you free salvation he offers to give,
Turn thee from your error, oh, turn ye and live!

To-day Jesus calls you! he knocks at your door,
O! haste thee to open, refuse him no more;
No more slight his love, offered boundless and free,
Quaff deep from the fountain now flowing for thee.

To-day Jesus calls you! O sinner, come home,
To-morrow may seal the impenitent's doom!
Delay not till mercy invites thee no more,
And the day of salvation forever is o'er.

For the Crisis.

"The Press is Full."

BY S. S. BREWER.

"Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe: come, get ye down, for the press is full, the fats overflow; for their wickedness is great."—JOEL.

The inhabitants of rural districts and small villages in our once peaceful country have but a very faint conception of the degraded condition of our own and foreign nations. It is not my design to attempt to present very lengthy articles on the different places I shall introduce in these few numbers on this subject, but as we are often reminded by some that the world is fast improving under the preaching of the gospel, we feel anxious to present some facts which go to show that, instead of getting better, the fats overflow with wickedness; and according to the signs in the moral world as well as all others, it will soon be commanded—"Thrust in thy sharp sickle and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes are fully ripe." The following article, from the pen of Rev. Dr. John Cumming, presents a gloomy picture of the city of London:—

"The Rev. Dr. Cumming, in commenting on the Infidelity of the age, remarks of the City of London:—'Within a radius of eight miles of St. Paul's cathedral there are about two millions of people—the largest population ever assembled within the limits of a city. If all the churches and chapels,—Protestant, Established, Dissenting, Roman Catholic, and Socinian—were as full as they could hold, there would not be within them one-fourth of that mighty population. If I take them at a season when the weather is fine, and the public health good, and every thing is favorable, you will find the average attendance to be each only one-fourth full. If that be the average, the result will be that there are never more in church on one Sunday, in all denominations, than, if I take the largest, about 200,000 people, out of a population of two millions. And how many, do you think, of that number, are communicants?—Startling fact! awful stain upon the missionary zeal—the aggressive efforts of the metropolis! there are scarcely 60,000 who so far profess the gospel as to avail themselves of the opportunity of commemorating the dying love, and receiving the pledges of the second advent of the Lord Jesus Christ. So true is this, that the steamboats and the railways alone carry from the metropolis every Sunday morning a greater population than all the churches and chapels together any one day contain.'

The Rev. Dr. states further, that there are in London 200,000 Roman Catholics; 12,000 children trained to pick pockets, with the greatest tack, speed and success, or to plunder houses with the best chance of escape; 3000 receivers of stolen property; 4000 are annually committed for crimes; 10,000 gamblers; 20,000 live by begging; 30,000 regular thieves; 150,000 habitual gin-drinkers; 150,000 of both sexes, who lead a life of debauchery and licentiousness. 'Thus there is a greater number of ostensibly depraved and abandoned characters in the service of Satan, than there are during Sunday in the house of Prayer.'

'This great city sends annually a million of money for the conversion of the ends of the earth, and rightly so,—but alas, there are millions more needed for the conversion of the population at home. And, melancholy and painful spectacle! in the midst of this scene of demoralization, ignorance, and crime, the ministers of the everlasting gospel are found quarrelling and disputing with each other about details of discipline and forms of worship.'"

A THIEVES' EXCHANGE.—The Rev. Thomas Hugo, curate of St. Botolph, London, in a letter to the London Times, gives the following description of a THIEVES' EXCHANGE, located in the heart of that great city, and which hitherto has bid defiance to all the efforts of the police to break it up:

"In the heart of London, on every successive Sunday in the year, in various streets, alleys and courts to the north of Houndsditch, and therefore in my own immediate neighborhood, are congregated upwards of 15,000 persons, engaged in traffic of various kinds, and constituting what is called the 'City Exchange Fair.' The trade is carried on principally in Cutler Street, Phil's Buildings, City Exchange, Exhibition Mart, Harrow Alley, and Petticoat Lane, places notorious in the annals of crime for outrages and abominations of all descriptions. The articles offered for sale consist for the most part of wearing apparel and jewelry, and the fair lasts for the greater portion of the day. I speak from personal observation and inspection, and hesitate not to characterize the place as one of the very foulest sinks of profligacy and crime to be found within the length and breadth of London. Of the 15,000 individuals there assembled, some are Jews of the lowest grade, but the great majority are nominally christians; uniting together in forming a multitude of the most ignorant, lawless, brutal and degraded ruffians that the metropolis can furnish. In this vile haunt crimes are both plotted and perpetrated; for in a spot at the entrance to Harrow Alley, I was myself informed, on the occasion of one of my visits, by one of our excellent police, that of all the males there congregated, of various ages, and to the number of several hundreds, every individual had been a convicted felon. Stolen property is here deposited to any extent, and no questions asked; and an inducement is thereby held to thieves from every quarter to bring hither the results of their crimes, assured of their immediate and safe disposal.

I could furnish you with many details of this den of horrors, but I will content myself with affirming that if there be an epithet in the English tongue more descriptive than another of a place reeking with blasphemy, clamor and obscenity, and of loathsome assemblage stained with every vice named or nameless, I would select and apply it to this foulest of foul scenes and filthiest of filthy multitudes. No man can possibly imagine it who has not visited the place and seen with his own eyes."

There, dear reader, is a picture of a city that probably has sent more missionaries among the heathen than any other in the world! Alas! for poor fallen mortality.

Another writer in a very brief manner gives as dark a coloring to the French metropolis:—

"A DARK PICTURE.—It is said of Paris that one out of every 3000 persons commits suicide; that two-thirds of the population cannot afford the expense of burial; that in every three births one is illegitimate; that 30,000 persons besides those assisted by regular charities arise every morning without knowing how they will get a dinner; and that 17,000 habitual drunkards, of the most brutal character, disgrace the city."

The N. Y. Mercury of Oct. 3d, 1857, has the following:—

"THE INIQUITIES OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.—New York, the metropolis of the United States, with its tremendous population and promiscuous mingling of all classes from all climes, is often held up by the provincial press as a solemn example of the evil tendencies of civilization in large cities. But it is distinctly proven, by recent developments, that there is quite as much depravity in proportion to the population in other cities, and indeed in the most rural districts of the country, as here; and some of the larger towns go far beyond New York, rivaling the great cities of Europe in the number and openness of their temptations. Of these Washington is said to be the first and foremost, and the next Congress will, it is reported, take efficient action in the matter of uprooting and suppressing as much of the partially concealed vice of the city as is possible. . . Its finest edifices are degraded to the occupation of gamblers and prostitutes, and many of its most aristocratic families frequent almost nightly their resplendent parlors and salons. Law and order are negatived in this city of misdoers, and the police have been so long the willing participants in the profits of nefarious traffics, that any upright action on their part is never looked for, unless paid for beforehand with greater liberality than that evinced by the law breakers.

The principal avenues of the city, and the one which constitutes its greatest beauty, is an almost unbroken row of gambling hells and bagnois, where poisoned wine, painted women, and the maddening hazard of the faro-bank or roulette-wheel are in nightly operation. Their proprietors are safe in the knowledge that no officer can be found to arrest them, and that their rapidly increasing wealth will soon place them beyond the reach of what is already ironically known as 'Washington Justice.'

Gamblers and prostitutes throng the streets by day, seeking for victims, and insulting the virtuous, in the busy season. When the Houses are in session, rich harvests are reaped by them from the members, who, instead of setting that example which the law-givers and rulers of a great country should, are too many of them addicted to the worst vices which these places of iniquity gratify. In the dull summer months a smaller but still a large and regular income is derived from the tempting of young men, mostly government officials, with a thousand or two a year, who leave the lion's share of their small earnings in the hands of these depredators, often depriving their wives and children of many of the comforts of life in order to gratify their games of chance, or rather, the uncontrollable frenzy of the hazard-stricken.

All this is perfectly known in the city, both to the people and the authorities, yet nothing is done to lessen these crying evils. Washington is, in the language of a correspondent to the Richmond South, 'in the condition of a conquered city, being in the hands of gamblers and prostitutes.'"

In reviewing this subject, we are led to exclaim in the language of the ancient seer,—"The earth is defiled under the inhabitants thereof." Dark, and sad and gloomy indeed are the shadows of the evening. The sun of earth's destiny is about to set in a deluge of fire and brimstone, and consume a generation that has been exalted far beyond any precedent. Truly, my hands hang down, and when I would comfort myself against sorrow, my heart is faint within me. It seems to me we are fast reaching a point when God will no longer withhold his pent up wrath. Tokens of the speedy execution of his righteous judgment already begin to gleam around us. It seems almost impossible with any degree of success to make people feel the force of truth. Scripture testimony, argument, tears, prayers, expostulations, fail to convince, to any extent, the poor sinner of his need of a Savior, or the worldly-minded professor of religion in his mantle of sectarian self-righteousness, the solemn fact that the end of all things is at hand. Gracious Giver of all good! is thy Spirit about to be withdrawn from this highly favored generation? Help! help a feeble worm to fight the good fight of faith. Look! see! the sun is about to set. Seek for shelter, that in the day of his wrath you may be hid. Amen.

Napoleon and the Jews.

The following outline is written by the Rev. Mr. Baxter of the Episcopal Church, being the substance of a discourse by him in Chapman Hall on Sunday evening, Dec. 8th.—ED.

There is great reluctance on the part of the general public, and even among true Second Advent believers, to decide upon the exact chronological position of the prophetic periods. The failure of the celebrated William Miller's expectation as to 1843, is alleged as a cause of this unwillingness to fix upon a date for the time of the second advent. Yet we should be led by former failures to study the chronology of prophecy more carefully, rather than to throw it aside in despair as incomprehensible. It is a fact, although not generally known, that Miller's view as to 1843 was in many respects quite correct, and remarkably verified by the event. He, as well as the eminent Bickersteth, of England, predicted several years beforehand that the sanctuary would be cleansed at the end of the 2300 years (Dan. 8 : 14) in 1843, which according to Jewish reckoning terminated in March 20, 1844. On the very day thus predicted, the 2300 years actually did terminate; for on March 21, 1844, the sanctuary was cleansed in its primary signification by liberty for religious worship being granted throughout all Turkey, by an edict obtained from the Sultan, through the earnest remonstrances of the five European powers. For 780 years previously, during the Turkish Woe under the sixth trumpet from 1063 to 1843, no Mahometan could renounce his false creed, except under penalty of instant death, but on March 21, 1844, this sanguinary decree was abrogated; and the inestimable boon of religious liberty was conferred upon the millions of Turks,—a most momentous change, the importance of which cannot be overrated. The 2300 years were mentioned in connection with the Grecian goat (Dan. 8), and refer chiefly to the territory of the Macedonian Empire, which consisted in a great measure of Turkey: therefore "the cleansing of the sanctuary" must have relation principally to Turkey and the Holy Land.

The error in Miller's interpretation was two-fold. First, he took the term "cleansing of the sanctuary" to be of wider application, than merely to the Turkish Empire, to which it alone refers; and secondly, he failed to observe that the process of cleansing the sanctuary was to last for about 25 years, which undoubtedly began on March 21, 1844, and therefore cannot end sooner than March 21, 1869, about which time the whole region of Turkey and Palestine will possess complete liberty for religious worship and be cleansed from Mohammedanism and all corrupt religions by the descent of Christ on Mt. Olivet (Zech. 14) and the beginning of the Millennium. Bickersteth in common with Miller foretold some years previously the ending of the 2300 years in 1843–4, because it evidently began with the 70 weeks in 457 B. C., on the last day of the year (Ezr. 7 : 8, 10; 17) when Ezra finished his restoration of the daily sacrifice. But at the same time Bickersteth showed that the daily sacrifice restored by Ezra in Artaxerxes' 7th year was only temporarily continued and soon ceased, thus necessitating another restoration of the daily sacrifice by Nehemiah, who was 12 years occupied in the work (Neh. 5 : 14), and who at length in Artaxerxes' 32d year rectified all abuses and effected a complete and permanent renewal of the daily sacrifice (Neh. 13 : 6). From Artaxerxes' 7th year until his 32nd year, there is an interval of 25 years, and therefore Bickersteth stated (as early as April 1839) that although the cleansing of the sanctuary would begin about 1843, yet it would not be completed until 25 years later, about 1868. We see that this prediction has been fulfilled to the letter up to the present time, and there can be little doubt but that the rest of it will prove correct. There is thus a primary and secondary fulfillment of the 2300 years (as well as of the 2520 (Dan. 4 : 16) and 1260 years:) first, from the commenced restoration of the sacrifice by Ezra in Artaxerxes' 7th year in 457 B. C., until the commenced cleansing of the sanctuary in March 21, 1844: secondly, from the complete restoration of the sacrifice by Nehemiah in Artaxerxes' 32nd year in 432 B. C., until the complete cleansing of the sanctuary of the Holy Land in 1868 (which ends on March 20, 1869).

It is observable that the 1260 lunar years of Mohammedanism, which began at the Hegira in 622 A. D., ended in 1844. The Mohammedans had long been warning each other to beware of the fatal 1260th year. Also the Turkish Woe under the fifth trumpet is generally taken to last twice a year and month (Rev. 9 : 15), i. e., twice 390 years, from 1063 to 1453, the fall of Constantinople, and then onward to 1843–4. Thus 1843–4, though not the time of Christ's advent, was yet, as shown by Miller, a most important epoch, being the termination of no less than three great chronological periods—the 2300 years, the 780 years (twice 390) of the sixth trumpet or Turkish Woe, and the 1260 lunar years of Mohammedanism. We are now living between the sixth trumpet or second Woe, which ended in 1844, and the seventh trumpet or third Woe which will begin about 1864. Our present position is described by the words (Rev. 11 : 14), "The second woe is passed, and behold the third woe cometh quickly." This terrible third Woe will be ushered in by the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet about 1864, while Christ will descend "into the air" to raise the dead saints and remove the 144,000 wise virgins into a place of safety within the chambers of the New Jerusalem. Then after a few months, during which the three angel-messages will be proclaimed throughout the startled world, the storm will burst upon Christendom with awfully tremendous violence, causing such great tribulation for three and a half years that "except those days were shortened, no flesh should be saved." Woe to those who are then dwelling upon the earth, for the Devil being cast from the air to the earth will have great wrath, knowing his time is short (Rev. 12). He will enter into the Infidel Antichrist (Louis Napoleon), and impel him to encompass Jerusalem with his armies, and have his image placed on the Jewish Temple by the Pope, the two-horned Beast (Rev. 13). Wherever his Empire extends (and it will be nearly a universal one), all will be slain who refuse to worship his image or receive his mark in their forehead or in their hand. The saints will be slaughtered like sheep: infidelity and spiritualism will reign supreme, and all the world will bow down before the great Antichrist, crying, "Who is like unto him? Who is able to make war with him?"

It is believed that Louis Napoleon will then possess great power, if not absolute supremacy, over all Europe, including Great Britain, and over Mexico and countries in South America, and even Canada, and the United States in North America; also that he will keep possession of Rome, probably being ultimately crowned there, and that he will speedily re-occupy Syria. His seven-years' covenant with the Jews, according to the statement, Dan. 9 : 27, "He (the Prince that shall come) shall confirm the covenant with many for one week," can scarcely be expected to be made earlier than Jan. 6, or March 21, 1862, and may perhaps be later. Bickersteth, in 1839, published it as his belief that the seven-years' covenant with the Jews would be confirmed about 1861, which year by Jewish reckoning will end on March 20, 1862. It would make very little difference, however, if it should take place a few months later. It appears that nine or ten months after it is made, the Jews will re-commence their sacrifices at Jerusalem. It is not improbable that the present financial difficulties of Napoleon might lead to an arrangement between him and the Rothschilds or other leading Jews, that in consideration of a loan, he should guarantee protection to the Jews at Jerusalem. It is said that many of them are even prepared to receive him as their Messiah—a title which, it seems from prophecy he is, some day to assume. M. Fould, the newly appointed Minister of Finance, is a Jew by birth. The increasing favor shown by Napoleon to this ancient people has further been evinced by the formation, under his sanction, of an Israelitish Association for promoting the interests of the Jews. All the signs of the times [illegible]

watch the movements in Europe relating to the re-establishment of Israel in Palestine. The most tremendous judgments, such as famines, pestilences, earthquakes, conflagrations, revolutionary convulsions, and infidel persecutions, are about to desolate this and every other part of Christendom until the end about 1869. Let us be found not only converted and pardoned through earnest prayer to God in the name of Jesus, but likewise really expecting Christ's coming in the air about 1864, at which time it seems most probable to occur. In order to redeem the time, we cannot do better than follow the example of such men as Havelock, and G. Muller (whose "Life of Trust" should be read by every one), and never pass a day without spending an hour or two alone in prayer and meditating on the Scriptures; for this habit is indispensably necessary to the attainment and possession of spiritual-mindedness and nearness to God.

The Eastern N. Y., and Western Mass. and Conn. Advent Conference.

At the Camp meeting held at South Dover, N. Y., Sept. 14th, 1861, it was proposed to organize a conference composing the Eastern part of N. Y. and the Western part of Mass. and Conn. Bro. V. R. Fenn was appointed Chairman; Bro. Geo. L. Teeple Secretary. It was voted that a committee of three be appointed to draft a plan to present to the conference at its first meeting for its reception, rejection, or alteration.

Voted, That Brn. S. B. Munn, V. R. Fenn, and T. S. Canfield, be the committee.

Voted, That a committee be appointed to fix the time and place for the conference to meet. Brn. Geo. L. Teeple, and B. St. John were appointed.

Voted, To adjourn to meet at the call of the committee.

Met according to adjournment and call of the committee at Pawlings, N. Y., Thursday Eve., Nov. 14th, Bro. S. S. Brazee preached from 2 Cor. 2 : 16,—"Who is sufficient for these things?" He showed the work of preaching the gospel and the call to preach. Friday, 9 o'clock A. M., the meeting was called to order by the clerk, and in the absence of Bro. V. R. Fenn, Chairman, Bro. S. S. Brazee was appointed chairman pro tem. The meeting was then opened with prayer by Bro. Brazee. The formula for the constitution was then read, and after some discussion, amendments, &c., the following preamble and constitution were adopted:

ARTICLE I. The boundaries of this conference shall be as follows: north by the line between Mass. and Vermont; east by the Conn. river; south by the Atlantic ocean, including Long Island; west by the Hudson river; provided, however, there are preachers and churches near the line outside the limits of the conference that wish to unite with us, they may do so by vote and signing the constitution.

ARTICLE II. This conference shall be composed of ministers and churches represented by their delegates.

ARTICLE III. Ministers sustaining a christian character, and churches represented by their delegates, shall be admitted to this conference by vote and signing the constitution.

ARTICLE IX. The order of this conference shall be:—1st, The Business; 2nd, Meetings for prayer and exhortation and the ministry of the Word.

ARTICLE X. No article of this constitution shall be amended or rescinded, except by vote of two-thirds of the members of this conference at a regular meeting.

Signed by the following preachers:—S. S. Brazee, Geo. L. Teeple, S. B. Munn, T. S. Canfield, C. W. Baker, B. St. John, J. K. Bellows, S. P. Babcock, Chas. Gardner, V. R. Fenn. Adjourned till 2 o'clock, P. M.

Met according to adjournment. Opened with prayer by Bro. Babcock. Voted, To elect officers by ballot. The following were elected:—S. B. Munn, President; B. St. John, Vice President; Geo. L. Teeple, Secretary and Treasurer. Voted, That a committee of three be appointed to locate the next meeting. Brn. Brazee, Babcock, and Canfield were appointed. Brn. Munn, Teeple, and Canfield, were appointed a committee to [illegible] conference for ordination, and give letters of recommendation. Adjourned to meet Saturday, at half past 9 A. M. Preaching in the evening by Bro. Babcock, from Ex. 2 : 24,—The groaning of the church and its rejoicing.

Saturday, met according to adjournment. Opened with prayer by Bro. Baker. Voted, That Bro. Wm. A. Fenn be admitted to this conference by his signing the constitution. The committee appointed to prepare an address to the churches were authorized to prepare a plan of church government to be sent to the churches for their adoption. The following resolutions were passed unanimously: Resolved, That each preacher in this conference shall have an examination as to his christian character at each quarterly meeting. Resolved, That each preacher in this conference shall make a report at each quarterly meeting of his labors during the quarter, and of the condition of the churches where he has labored. Adjourned till 5 P. M.

In the afternoon Bro. Gardner preached. Being absent, we could not speak of the discourse, but heard it was good.

Met according to adjournment. Opened with prayer by Bro. Teeple. The committee appointed to prepare an address to the churches reported, and the report was accepted. Brn. Munn, Teeple, and Canfield, were appointed to prepare a report of the doings of the conference for publication. Adjourned to meet on the sixth day of Feb. A. D. 1862. Preaching in the evening by Bro. Teeple from 1 Cor. 3 : 9. He showed the foundation which was laid and the nature of the building erected thereupon.

Sunday morning Bro. Wm. A. Fenn preached from Isa. 59 : 19. He showed that God raised up the right kind of a standard, at the right time; and at this time of the spread of Spiritualism, God raised up the standard of truth to testify that "the dead know not anything." In the afternoon, Bro. Babcock preached from Dan. 10 : 21. He showed the truth relative to the soon coming of Christ. In the evening, Bro. Baker preached from 1 Tim. 3 : 16. He spake of Jesus Christ, coming as the babe of Bethlehem, his going away as the Mediator, and his coming as king.

Thus closed our conference, and all remarked at its close that they rejoiced that the spirit of Christ was so manifest among the preachers during the meeting. Love and unity prevailed, and we separated feeling that God was well pleased with our conduct and deliberation. May God speed the right.

GEO. L. TEEPLE, Sec'y of Conference.

That New Book.

What new book? Why! "RETRIBUTION." Well, what about it? Simply this; it had been spoken of in such high terms in the Crisis that I had really formed a high opinion of it,—which opinion was premature,—but now I have read the book for myself,—and am disappointed, DISAPPOINTED! I say I had formed a favorable opinion of the book before reading it, and after reading it, I was disappointed. Let others read it before forming an opinion of it, and thus save the disappointment. However, the disappointment was a happy one to me. The merits of the book far exceeded my fondest anticipations. It is, in the main, a very excellent volume. Let everybody speedily purchase and read it. I request, especially, all of my western friends to supply themselves with this work. Let us order over a thousand copies immediately to scatter within the bounds of our conference. Let not a minister be deaf to this solicitation, as the book so clearly negates the sentiments which our foes often charge upon us, and which we as stoutly deny. Come, friends, send at once for a supply of "Retribution." It not only hits the "nail on the head," but it drives it so deep that its head will not present itself for another blow.

WORTHY OF IMITATION.—"Dr. Clarkson, rector of St. James Church, Chicago, thinking the lay members ought to share in the labors of the parish, has organized five divisions of church labor, viz: relieving the poor; aiding the Sunday school; bringing in young men and strangers; care of the chancel; diminishing the funded debt; and on this plan he has set his parishioners to work."

For the Crisis.

"WHAT WORK SHALL I KEEP TO LEND?"—I answer, "Reasons for my Hope." It is well calculated to lead the reader to seek for more light. It lets the light in so gradually and cautiously that it does not blind the inmates of the dungeon of theological darkness. Buy it to lend.

JEWS.—It is said that in the year 1850 there were only ten synagogues in the whole land. To-day there are over a quarter of a million of Jews and about ninety synagogues, and smaller communities, out of which will soon be organized other synagogues. In the city of New York there are twenty synagogues and thirty thousand Jews, or about one twentieth of the population of that city. In all the principal seaboard cities there are synagogues; there are two in Boston, [illegible]

The World's Crisis
AND
SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, Dec. 18, 1861.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

HEREAFTER ALL LETTERS, COMMUNICATIONS, REMITTANCES AND ORDERS FOR THE WORLD'S CRISIS ARE TO BE DIRECTED TO ELDER MILES GRANT, BOSTON, MASS.
H. L. HASTINGS, President C. P. S.

Bills this Week.

This week we send bills to those who have not paid any thing for the Crisis during the last fifteen months. It is ever unpleasant for us to say any thing about money matters in the columns of our paper, lest some should think we wish to crowd them unnecessarily. But do not look at the subject in this light. We will be brethren in this matter. But if you can possibly send us a part, or all of what is now truly due the office, you will receive our hearty thanks.

If you cannot pay any thing at present, and wish the paper continued, please drop us a line, expressing your wishes, and we will do the best we can for you. We hope to be allowed the pleasure of continuing our weekly visits to your families, that we may administer to them comfort and strength in these last-day perils. Never did we need all the help and sympathy that each can afford more than at the present. Then let us all rally anew for the defence of the truth, and soon the conflict will end in everlasting rest.—O.

"The Lord is Coming."

With the amount of evidence before us, we think it certain that Jesus is coming soon. If the great accumulation of signs and events now around us, all of which are in harmony with the prophecies that refer to the last days, do not surely indicate that "the Lord is soon coming," then we see no reason to expect any knowledge of the approach of this great event till it bursts upon us. But if it transpires without the very signs that are passed and passing, then the prophecy of Christ touching this point will be proved a failure. It is a remarkable fact that the signs have appeared in the precise order in which they have been laid down in the Scriptures; hence their correctness is demonstrated, excepting the fulfillment of the event signified. The same prophecies that prove the Bible true, show that the end is at hand; and we have no reason to expect a repetition of the signs, or that the event, of which they are forerunners, is far in the future.

If the darkening of the sun and moon in 1780, the falling stars in 1833, and the distress of nations with perplexity that has followed, and is now before us, are not the signs referred to by the Savior, we do not see how the true ones are to be known. Should they appear again in the same order, we should not know but they would be seen thousands of times; hence, they would be so indefinite as to cease to be a sign. They cannot appear in any other order, and be the true signs; consequently we are confined to the belief that this generation will not pass away till the Lord shall appear. Again, as these signs have had a literal fulfillment, it is folly to look for a spiritual accomplishment. As these signs are given in answer to the inquiry, "what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" and have been seen at the very time near where the prophetical periods that run to the end, appear to be terminating, and the great chains of prophetic history are closing, there is a small margin left on which to predicate a doubt in the statement, "Jesus is coming soon."

Many who have been indifferent to this great subject, are now turning their attention to its examination, while others, who were once interested, have fallen asleep, conformed to the world, and see no light. A sermon was preached before the U. P. Synod of Illinois, Aug. 28, 1861, from the text, "Can ye not discern the signs of the times?"—Matt. 16 : 3, in which the speaker says, as reported in the Advent Herald:—O.

"The period immediately preceding the advent will be distinguished as a time of great trouble, anxiety and consternation among all classes of society, see Luke 21 : 25, 26, 'And upon the earth, distress of nations, with perplexity, the sea and the waves roaring, men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth.' The Saviour speaks of these as immediate precursors of his second coming. They certainly refer to a time which is to be remarkable for the things named. But are we not now beginning to realize something of this distress of nations—much, very much of this perplexity, and fear, and evil foreboding? Nations like individuals sometimes have presentiments. This was true at the time of the first advent. Men, as it were, held their breath, sure that something remarkable was about to transpire. And so it is now! The civilized world is fairly oppressed with the conviction that we are upon the threshold of some grand crisis; some great turning point in the history of our world. If we are not living in the time indicated by the Savior, it is possible we will fail to know it when it comes. [illegible]

Finally, the last days, and therefore the days immediately preceding the advent will [illegible] ilous times shall come: For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy. Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof.' This is a sad picture, yet since the apostle tells us that the persons spoken of have a form of godliness, we must look for its original in the church of God; nor need we look long to find it in our own day. Is it not very largely true, that there is now scarcely any such thing as discipline known in the church? What enormity can the imagination paint which some one or more of the churches does not tenderly cover over with the mantle of religion? Even the slaveholder, who seems the embodiment of all that is wicked,—whose crime is 'the sum of all villanies,' finds a safe lodging-place in many of the churches. Beside, it is an age distinguished for selfishness, pride, insubordination, and formality. No part of the church can plead not guilty, to these charges. Is it harsh, then, is it uncharitable, to say that the apostle describes in the above language, the church of our own times, and that consequently we are living in the time closely trenching upon the coming of Jesus Christ?

Such are some of the signs of our times, —signs which all point with unerring certainty, to one grand coming event—an event so glorious, that its prospect should fill every christian heart with an ecstasy of joy . . .

If the foregoing reasoning be correct, then we cannot have the millennium before the advent. If the advent is near, as indicated by the signs, there is no room for the millennium this side of it. The signs cannot occur, and all pass away a thousand years in advance of the thing signified. Then they would be no signs. They cannot occur during the millennium—these, or any like them. It would suppose a state of things wholly unlike the millennium. They cannot transpire at the close of the millennium; for between that and the final judgment, there is but a 'little season,' and that little season is so completely taken up with events peculiarly its own, that there is no time nor place for these signs. Yet if we put the advent at the close of the millennium, we must put the signs there too. And what a strange confounding and misplacing of events that would be! The kingdom does not come in its power before the King; the millennium does not come before the advent.

Want of Knowledge.

When Paul was moved by the Holy Spirit to describe the state of things in the "last days," as recorded in a graphic manner in 2 Tim. 3 : 1–8, he says of a certain class:—"For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts. Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth. Now as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also resist the truth: men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith." We think it is no difficult matter to find the application of this Scripture, which is to be fulfilled "in the last days." As there is no reason to doubt that we are now in the last days, we must expect to find this portion of truth now in process of fulfillment. As a guide, in ascertaining who they are in the last days that will "creep into houses" to "lead captive" certain ones, he says they will "resist the truth" "as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses." How did they withstand Moses? By their pretended miracles, and claim that they could do as much as Moses. Is there a class of persons in these "last days" who resemble them? None can dispute the fact. Are they "ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth?" Let Mr. Fishbough, a noted Spiritualist, answer. After an absence of several years, he attended the Spiritual conference at Clinton Hall, New York, Oct. 29th, 1861. In the course of his remarks, he is reported to have said:—

"After an absence from the conference of several years, I find its speakers (saying nothing of the body of hearers, whom, perhaps, they do not adequately represent)—I find its prominent minds just where I left them—still discoursing on topics which ought to have been settled ten years ago." —Banner of Light.

Thus they are convicted by their own testimony. In all their boasted progress, they make none towards the truth; but every step leads them further from it. As all the spirits, who pretend to be the spirits of our deceased friends, are lying ones; of course, those who believe them, can never arrive at the truth. Of all systems of error, this caps the climax. But we are satisfied the worst of it is yet to come. Thank the Lord for the scales of truth in which to weigh all systems of error and false doctrine.—O.

The Regiment of Spiritualists.

It is said a regiment of Spiritualists is being formed to engage in the war. It is to "be commanded by a well-known Spiritualist and medium." A writer on the subject says, "We have no doubt but this regiment of mediums . . . may become one of the most marked objects of the campaign." Those who think the influence of Spiritualism is dying out, are as far from having a correct view of the matter, as a blind man who should pass down a noisy brook till it became a deep flowing stream, and conclude the latter contained the smallest amount of water because it made the least noise. The tide of Spiritualism is setting in upon every church, and invading almost every household, with its poisonous doctrines of demons. Like the seducer, it makes flattering promises, but it leads to destruction, ruin—death. Its doctrines are [illegible]

Discord and Strife.

It is strange that any can be so blinded by false systems and theories as to believe, against all evidence, that the world is growing better—progressing to a higher moral condition. Were it so, the Bible would be proved untrue, for it positively declares, when speaking of "the last days," that "evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." The following extract from a private letter from Kentucky, published in the Journal of Commerce, will give the reader some idea of the progress of this age:—O.

"Discord, strife, and enmity pervade all ranks of society. They have entered the counting-room, the social circle, the schoolhouse, and the church; and where friendship and concord once existed, they have arrayed husband against wife, father against son, brother against brother, friend against friend. So universally is this the case throughout this State at present, that the circle where disaffection does not exist forms an exception to the general rule. What will be the result of all this? Where or when it will end, God only knows. Truly, truly, we have fallen upon evil times."

Prophetic Periods.

The time was, when the study of the prophetic periods occupied the attention of our people as no other subject did. While other portions of the prophetic word were full of wholesome instruction, and comforted our hearts with the assurance that the coming of the Lord was nigh, it was the prophetic periods more than all else that first led us to make a speciality of the doctrines connected with the second advent. They gave a definiteness to our faith and form of expression that nothing else could. On this account we were valiant in the great moral warfare in which we were engaged; bold in professing our faith, and as honest and earnest in our belief;—in consideration of it we made immense sacrifices; but in all this we were abundantly blessed of God. It has been thought by some, God could not bless his people in such a course while under such a mistake; but this by no means follows. God blessed Abraham in offering his son Isaac, though in the end it was seen Abraham was under a great mistake; for doubtless he was never more honest than in the belief that it was his duty to slay his son—contrary to God's purpose from the beginning. But God blessed him for his self-sacrificing spirit—for his disposition to obey God. This spirit of obedience is the very germ and essence of holiness. It is what God always did and will bless, whenever and wherever exhibited. And it was for this God blessed us, though in at least a partially erroneous belief concerning the prophetic periods.

The most grievous fault connected with this move was the dogmatic and censorious spirit too often manifested by those whose minds were intensified by an honest conviction, no doubt, that they had determined the precise period when these prophetic numbers would end. It was doubtless this that helped in a very considerable degree to invoke the deep prejudices that were manifested by our opposers. These things afforded a lesson we doubtless would do well to remember. Every spirit begets its own likeness always.

With the passing of the time at which we had expected the return of the Messiah, came the disappointment—the deep mortification of mind, which can be known to those only who have experienced it. A spirit doubtless much like that experienced by Jonah while sitting beneath the gourd tree: when, though God's purpose had been realized—in that many souls had been brought to repentance—Jonah felt exceedingly disconcerted. It is not impossible, and indeed is to be feared, that many minds were so much affected on this wise, that it will be difficult to interest them, as they ought to be interested, in the accumulating evidences of the speedy return of the Lord.

Be our mistakes however what they may, it remains true,—First, that the prophetic periods are a part and portion of the inspired Scriptures—a portion that was particularly useful to God's people in times past; as was seen in the termination of the sixty-nine prophetic weeks, when the Messiah made his first advent to earth. Second, "All scripture given by inspiration" "is profitable."—2 Tim. 3 : 16. And third, if profitable must sooner or later be in some sense more or less understood. The argument that ends the 2300 and 1335 days about 1868, is to say the least certainly very plausible; and the fact as it is claimed, that there are at least fifty eminent scholars and divines who have come to the same conclusion, must certainly help to increase the conviction that this may be correct.

At all events, let us not be found sleeping, and that day come upon us unawares. It is better by far that we be many times disappointed, than that we become indifferent, and so be found unprepared for the event. "Knowing the time, it is high time to awake out of sleep."—M.

Lay Evangelists.

We were glad, after writing the two articles lately published in the Crisis, to find the following in the Independent. Let American churches learn from this example.—M.

"ENGLAND.—New Evangelistic Agency in Kent.—At the last annual meeting of the Kent Congregational Association, a resolution was passed, approving the employment of lay evangelists in the county and the raising of a special fund for their support. It occurred to the Executive Committee to call a conference of ministers and delegates of the churches to take the scheme into consideration, and to devise measures for carrying it out, and that a public meeting should be held on the same day to solicit funds. Such a conference and meeting took place at the Congregational chapel, Blackheath, Mr. S. Morley in the chair.

The chairman explained the object of the meeting, and the endeavors of the Home Missionary Society to induce the County Associations to engage in more extensive evangelistic work by means of lay agents to be wholly employed in domiciliary visitation and cottage preaching, in connection with the churches, and under the superintendence of local committees. The christian people of England were bound to open their eyes to the fact that a vast number of their fellow-countrymen were living without any correct knowledge of the way of salvation, and were in fact as much heathens as if they dwelt in India, Southern Africa, or China. That very county of Kent supplied facts in proof of the prevalence of this deplorable state of things. In 1851 there were as many as 180,000 persons in the county who could, but did not, attend a place of worship, and there was no reason to suppose that any material improvement had taken place since then. Some portions of the county were even more irreligious than these general statistics indicated. Of one large population of 70,000 adult persons, only from 5,000 to 6,000 attended public worship. A Mr. McMillan, recently of Taunton, in a letter which had just been received, bore a very decided testimony to the powerful influence which had been exerted by the three lay evangelists [illegible] man in the village where he now labors as an evangelist, and numbered among his Sunday evening congregation his old master, and many of his agricultural associates and neighbors. He displayed a superior knowledge of scripture, and was the possessor of a meek and prayerful spirit. It was believed that no less than five and thirty persons had been born to God by his instrumentality. These were the sort of men required; and at the morning conference it had been resolved that twenty such agents should be employed in Kent, in connection with the churches, and under the guidance and support of local committees, and that £1,000 a year should be raised for their support."

News from Bro. Howell.

As a large number of our readers are personally acquainted with our dear Bro. Howell, we feel justified in publishing the following from a private letter from Sister Howell:—O.

"Harvard, McHenry Co., Ill., Dec. 7.

DEAR BRO. AND SR. GRANT:—I have no good news to write this morning except that we are all alive. My husband is a poor, sick, suffering man, and perhaps, I may add, but just out of the grave. Nothing but a miraculous interposition of providence can save him much longer, as you will see when I describe to you his real state. I think I never saw a person who had so distressing a cough. Sometimes he coughs for hours almost incessantly without rest; expectorates nearly half a pint of putrid, greenish yellow matter in twenty-four hours; chills considerable during the day, and has a burning fever all night. He seems almost bloodless, and is very much emaciated. He has changed exceedingly since you saw him. His sunken eyes and sharpened features, if you could gaze upon them as I do this morning, would convince you that he must soon sleep the sleep of death, unless a speedy change takes place.

His breath is very short. Day before yesterday he was so distressed for breath for an hour, I did not know but he was dying. He has his clothes on every day, and sits up in a large rocking-chair a great part of the time. His back is so poor he cannot lie in bed with any comfort. I have just left my writing and helped him dress. I see his strength has failed since yesterday. He was so much exhausted, he looked as though he was dying when he got into his chair. Two or three weeks ago, he seemed to revive, was anxious to ride, and was carried out a few times; but I fear he will never go again. I have thought, until this week, that he might possibly get out again, though I did not expect him to get well; but now I have given up all hope.

My heart is almost burst with grief, but I have to suppress every emotion for his sake. Could I weep, tears would be such a luxury. This will be a dark world to me without my husband. I asked him what I should tell you for him? He says, "Tell them I appreciate them highly; am very low, but seeking to know God more perfectly; am trusting in providence." He requests an interest in your prayers. He constantly moans in his sleep. It is distressing to hear him. I take the whole care of him night and day; am most worn out, but will not now speak of myself. Yours affectionately, L. S. HOWELL."

Correspondence.

From B. P. Manning.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—I feel it a duty that I owe to God and my dear brethren, to drop a few lines through the Crisis, to inform them of my health, which is very poor at this time. I am a great sufferer, but thank the Lord, our suffering time will soon be over. Dear brethren, I am still "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."—Titus 2 : 13–15. Truly,

"We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time;
In an age on ages telling;
To be living is sublime.
Oh! let all the soul within you
For the truth's sake go abroad;
Strike! let every nerve and sinew
Tell on ages, tell for God."

I look back to the 5th day of June, 1842, when God delivered my soul. Then did I rejoice in God with a full heart; but how changed are the times! Where is the faith now in the coming of the Lord that there was in 1843–4? O, dear brethren, it is sad to think of. Well, notwithstanding so many have given up, the foundation of God standeth sure. Jesus is coming soon. O how glad I am that I have been kept by the power of God, through faith, up to this time; and I do believe, if I am faithful a little longer, deliverance will come. Truly, the nations are angry. Now is the time to watch and pray. Be ready and waiting, and "follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord."

Dear brethren, we must be holy men, and keep ourselves unspotted from the world. John says, "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Now, dear brethren, obey God in all things, that we may be found ready to go into the marriage supper of the Lamb, when he comes. Pray for me, dear brethren, that my faith fail not.

Yours, looking for redemption when Jesus comes.

Goffstown, N. H., Nov. 24th, '61.

From Peter S. W. Deyo.

DEAR BRO. GRANT:—We have had some good times here, for this place, of late. The conference left a good impression, so that we thought Bro. Sheldon had better come back again. Accordingly I sent for [illegible] was, thirteen were received into this church, and nine were baptized, and we expect some more will follow their example, and be added to the church soon. This is a good work considering the state of the place. Last winter, there was an effort made on the part of the Baptists, with no special result. The doctrine of universal salvation seemed to hold the people as with a spell. But we are grateful to God that the truths of the gospel have not lost their effects, although we had a strong secret opposition.

Some preachers said they had rather have no conversions, than to have them converted in this meeting, but the people inclined their ears and obeyed the Lord. I am now holding a meeting a few miles from this place, and will give the result by and by. Hope the friends of the west will remember the cause and bear us to the throne of grace.

Strawberry Point, Nov. 14, '61.

From C. H. Stevens.

Bro. Grant:—I am still in the field, looking for the glorious hope of the gospel. I believe the time is at hand when Jesus will return, and with his saints take the kingdom and reign for ever. The day in which we live looks ominous, and pregnant with mighty events. The nations are perplexed and getting angry. The mighty men, the men of war, are waking and coming up; but beyond this dark, dark night, I see the dawn of a brighter day. Jesus will soon come. I love it more than my life. I would be glad to see the last sign appear, and then all the weary ones from death's dark dominion, will live an endless life.

In the last eight months I have been silent, said nothing of my labors, but I have not been wholly idle in the vineyard of the Lord. I have visited and labored more or less in the following places: Exeter, Dover, Lee, Nottingham, Northwood, Rye, Kennebunk Port, Me., and Lawrence, Mass. A short account of these visits and labors might be given, but they are sealed up for the great day to reveal. I hope a good report may come from the righteous Judge in that day, which is so soon to dawn upon us.

Exeter, N. H., Nov 25th, 1861.

Extracts from Letters.

Sr. C. S. Belding, of Ashland, Oct. 29th, 1861, writes:—"I wish my neighbors loved the Crisis as I do. But they do not love the idea that Jesus is coming back again. Sometimes I feel that I am alone, as I am the only one in this place that has this blessed hope of the resurrection. But I am not lonesome, for Jesus is with me, to guide and direct. I believe he is coming soon, and feel I am blessed in believing. My hope is growing brighter and brighter, and my faith stronger from day to day."

Sr. Susan Teeple, of Roxbury, Ct., Nov. 9th, writes:—"Dear Bro. Grant,—It seems quite natural to address our Editor again, and I pray God's blessing to rest upon him whilst his mind may be crowded with labor and care. The dear saints of God in this time of peril are glad of a paper. God grant the church may awake to a spirit of prayer that the Crisis may be better and better, like the path of the just, that grows brighter till the perfect day; for if ever there was a time when the household needed the right kind of food, it is now.

Iniquity abounds and the love of many waxes cold, and who, and how many of us that profess godliness, will endure to the end that we may be saved? I mean to be among the number. My privileges are small to-day compared with the past, and when I get with brethren and sisters, as I did at Dover, and also at Camp's Mills, I know how to prize the opportunity. But my lot is cast among the afflicted, and I choose to have it there; although affliction at present is grievous, yet there is a better day coming, and the sweet and precious promises on record I claim as mine. The Lord loveth whom he chasteneth, and I know he loves me. Praise his name! My affliction has been of late the loss of the use of my right hand, but I have learned "that all things work together for good to them that love God;" and many a useful lesson I have learned; to God belongs the glory. Such, I feel, I will never forget. O no. Then let me among the saints be found, when the Master comes to gather them.

I have kept my head above the waves thus far, and am still bound to press onward, knowing that "he that shall come will come, and will not tarry;" then the gathering day,—oh, how sweet the thought! No more aches and pains; no more sorrow nor tears; no more parting, but to live together, with Jesus in the midst. I join in the chorus, "I'll go, let me go." Let us by faith meet around the throne of God, and may our praying be effectual, that it may avail with the great Jehovah. Let us pray for our paper, that it may be the best in the world. We all know there is power in prayer, and the editor needs to be stayed up by our prayers. God help us."

Bro. Geo. E. Hooper, No. Hyde Park, Vt., Dec. 1st, writes:—"Inclosed is —— for our excellent family paper. I believe it to be the best religious paper published, and think I can succeed in having it read in some dozen or more families in this vicinity. I do rejoice in God that the day is almost here when Christ, our dear Saviour, will come in his kingdom. When I see the abounding of wickedness, and the love of many, that used to rejoice in our hope, grown cold, and who seem ashamed to broach the subject they once delighted in, I am led to mourn. O that we might live as in the fear of God in these last moments of time."

N. Wheeler, Cabot, Vt., Dec. 2d, writes: "God is at work in this vicinity. A few souls have been converted of late in the town of Woodbury; others are convicted of sin. Some prodigals have returned. 'God speed the right,' and to him be all the glory."

Obituary Notices.

Died, in Pittsfield, N. H., Oct. 14th, 1860, Mrs. Abigail Lane, wife of Mr. John Lane, aged seventy-six years and eight days.

She left a husband, seven children, and a large circle of friends to mourn her loss. She experienced religion many years ago, but was much troubled with doubts and fears, hardly daring to hope for fear she was not a christian. She suffered much from disease for many years, and would often pray for patience to endure her sufferings, and that she might be submissive to the will of God. Death had no terrors for her. She calmly and peacefully passed away, leaving her friends to mourn, but not as those that have no hope, for they feel assured that she sleeps in Jesus. May those that have enjoyed her kind care and counsel here, be prepared to reign with her hereafter. S. E. Lane.

Died, in Pittsfield, N. H., Oct. 26th, 1861, Mr John Lane, aged seventy-seven years and five months.

His disease was dropsy. The last five weeks that he lived he was a great sufferer, but notwithstanding the extreme sufferings of his body he had peace of mind, and at last peacefully and calmly passed away, to rest till the trump of God calls him forth to die no more. He leaves seven children and a large circle of other relatives to mourn. The writer delivered a discourse on the funeral occasion to an attentive audience, founded on these words, "If a man die, shall he live again?"—Job 14 14; and endeavored to answer the question in the affirmative, showing from Scripture that man would live again, and at the revelation of Jesus Christ.

Seth S. Mooney.

Died, in Northville, New Milford, Ct., Nov. 21st, of diphtheria and inflammation of the bowels, Lucy Lucenia, youngest daughter of George A. and Sarah A. Barker.

Lucy was the most pleasant disposed of all our children. She was sick four weeks, and was not heard to complain until inflammation set in. She was but six years, five months and fifteen days old when she died. But a few days before she was taken sick I said, "Take care and not take cold." She replied, "If I die with the diphtheria, the Lord will make me live again when he comes." Yes, praise the Lord, she will live again in the morning, though death has pierced our heart, and we shall see her in the kingdom. We were comforted by facts connected with the words of Jesus. "Jesus our hope," "Jesus the resurrection and life," "Jesus our life, our judge, our all."

Eld. H. Kirk, of the Reformed Methodist order, preached the word. And while the rain fell from the clouds, and the tears ran from the eyes of a weeping concourse of people, we buried her in the old church-yard. We ask the prayers of the good and the holy that we may "be strong in the Lord," and be ready to meet the saints in glory.

FOREIGN NEWS.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT FROM EUROPE.

Steamship Europa at Halifax Dec. 15.

War with the United States Threatened.

The Europa was detained at Queenstown twelve hours by order of the British government. She has a Queen's messenger on board with despatches for Lord Lyons.

The Mason and Slidell Affair. [By telegraph to Queenstown.] London, Dec. 1. The Observer, the ministerial journal, insists upon a demand for an apology from the Federal government, and also upon a restitution to the protection of the British flag of Mason and Slidell, who were violently and illegally torn from that sacred asylum.

Nearly all the London weekly papers treat the question of the San Jacinto in the same energetic spirit as the daily papers.

The agitation increases.

Queenstown, Dec. 1. The Observer states that the Government demands from President Lincoln and his Cabinet the restoration of the persons of the Southern envoys to the British government.

Yesterday afternoon, after five o'clock, Her Majesty held a privy council at Windsor Castle. Three of the ministers, including the first Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State and of War, traveled from London to Windsor by special train to be present. Previous to leaving town, the three ministers had attended a Cabinet council at Lord Palmerston's official residence.

The London Post says,—"It has been decided by the law officers of this crown that the action of Captain Wilkes was unjustifiable; that he had no right to arrest peaceful passengers sailing under the British flag, and the deed he has committed amounts to a flagrant violation of the code of nations, and is a direct insult to this country."

The arrangements for increasing the force in Canada are not yet completed, but in a very few hours everything will be settled. In the meantime a large ship, the Melbourne, has been taken up, and is now being loaded at Woolwich with Armstrong guns, some 80,000 Enfield rifles, ammunition and other stores. The rifles are intended for the Canadian militia. A strong reinforcement of field artillery will be dispatched forthwith.

In 1854 we were totally unprepared for war, and had to provide everything; but now by the large but unprecedented outlay of the past three years, we have obtained a degree of efficient power such as never before known.

The export of the material of gunpowder is prohibited.

The Times says, It becomes us to be prepared for an unfortunate issue.

The French ships forming the Mexican expedition were expected to assemble at Havana between the 15th and 20th of December.

In Italy, a levy of 80,000 men had been ordered, which it was expected would be followed in February by another levy, so that the effective army would then consist of 280,000 men.

Fifteen thousand Russian troops had attacked 10,000 mountaineers in Circassia, and were put to flight, after fighting six hours. Six thousand Russians were reported killed and wounded.

The Italian brigand, Chiavone, was being vigorously pursued by the national troops. He was endeavoring to regain the Papal States.

Accounts from the gold fields, of New Zealand, according to the Melbourne papers, continue very encouraging, and there was an immense rush of miners from Australia—all the available vessels being devoted to the purpose of carrying them over.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

The Great Fire in Charleston.

Branchville, Dec. 12. Passengers just arrived report a destructive fire last night at 9 o'clock, in Russell and Co.'s sash factory. Under the influence thus given and a stiff breeze, with a small supply of water, the conflagration assumed a formidable character, nearly equalling the most extensive conflagration on the American continent.

5 P. M. The fire is still raging. A thousand houseless persons are huddled in the streets.

Baltimore, Dec. 14. The Old Point boat brings a report of the discovery and prompt suppression, by the military authorities, of a negro insurrection at Charleston.

The account states that the plot was discovered by a body servant of a military officer, who said that the negroes of the city were to be joined by large bands of negroes from the country, who were to come in armed at night. He said the sash factory had been fired by a negro, whom he designated, and who has been arrested. A small quantity of arms was found under the floor of a negro's cabin. They were all new and in good order. In other negro cabins knives and hatchets were found secreted.

The greatest consternation prevailed. Families were closing and barring their windows.

Another account states that negro insurrections broke out in the interior of South Carolina two days before the fire, which was still raging unchecked; but the report is not well authenticated.

A dispatch received at the Merchants' Exchange Room yesterday states that three hotels, two newspaper offices, nine bank buildings, and over fifty mercantile houses were destroyed in the late fire at Charleston, S. C.

New York, Dec. 16. The Times Washington dispatch says, notwithstanding the belligerent attitude assumed by England, there is no disposition on the part of any member of the Cabinet to alter the plans or policy of the government assumed in the arrest of Mason and Slidell. The report of the demand for the release of Mason and Slidell causes great excitement. The sentiment of defiance is universal.

On Friday afternoon, Franklin's Rhode Island battery at Edward's Ferry opened fire upon the rebel fortifications in front of Leesburg and the neighboring woods, where the rebel troops have been concealed. Cannonading was kept up six hours with shell, and it succeeded in driving back the rebels to a safer distance.

Senators Hale, Clark, and others visited the camp of the 2d New Hampshire regiment at Stump Neck, Saturday, on the steamer Washington. The vessel was fired at by the rebel battery at Shipping Point, but was not hit.

Congress will adjourn Thursday next for two weeks on account of the holidays.

Washington, Dec. 16. The late news from England has occasioned no marked excitement among public men, the indignation of the British press having been anticipated. Hence the absence of expressions of surprise.

Fortress Monroe, Dec. 14. By the steamer Illinois, from Beaufort, we learn that all the islands adjacent to Port Royal are occupied by our troops, and immense quantities of cotton is being gathered and brought in by the soldiers, amounting in value to two million of dollars.

The chartered steamer Constitution, Capt. Fletcher, arrived this morning. She left Boston Nov. 21, with the 26th Massachusetts and 9th Connecticut regiments, and arrived at Ship Island Dec. 3. All the troops were landed the next day in four hours by some rebel steamers which had been captured by our fleet.

From California.—Terrible Rain Storm on the Pacific Coast. San Francisco, Dec. 10.—During the past four days the heaviest rain storm experienced for years has prevailed in California, causing severe freshets in the valleys and great destruction of property. The American river rose to a great height, breaking through the levee and flooding the city of Sacramento from one end to the other. The water is four feet deep in the streets this morning, and the people are driven to the second story of their houses. Business is entirely suspended.

The freshet from the recent heavy rains extends throughout the valley portions of the state. The damage done is immense. The farmers have suffered great loss by the drowning of their stock, while bridges, fences and other property have been swept away by the flood.

A part of Maysville and Stockton, as well as Sacramento, is entirely under water. A number of lives have been lost, but how many is not known. Several brick buildings at Maysville were undermined by the flood, and fell a heap of ruins. The loss of property at Sacramento is estimated at over half a million of dollars, and falls upon all the people of the city. Communication with many districts is cut off and business is suspended.

— A line of telegraph is said to be laid from Washington to Fortress Monroe, and possibly from that point to Hatteras, Port Royal, and other points further South.

— The Manchester Mirror of the 11th says that a man was seen plowing with a two-horse team in the vicinity of that city on that date. Last year at the same time the ground was heavily covered with snow.

— The Captain of the steamer Bermuda, which has been running the blockade into Charleston with arms and munitions of war, is said to belong in Skowhegan, Me. His name is Cassier.

— One sixth of the railroads in Switzerland are tunneled. The longest are under Jura, being 3259 metres in length.

— It is a torture to our enemies to return their injuries with kindness.

— The Erie canal has delivered at New York, since May 1st, 30,000,000 bushels of corn.

— A gentleman in Southern Illinois raised about one thousand acres of cotton the past season. It is a very good crop, and preparations are being made to plant about ten thousand acres next year.

— The Government has now nearly fifty thousand cavalry in the field and under marching orders.

— A Michigan paper says $550 per day is not far from a fair estimate of the value of the salt now manufactured upon the Saginaw River, and the business is but one year and four months old.

— An emerald has been found in the mines of Muco, (South Africa,) weighing over two pounds and a half, the largest in the world.

— About thirty parrot guns are turned out at the West Point foundry now per week. Four hundred and fifty men are employed in the manufacture of these guns, as also in forming projectiles.

— The interior of Australia, heretofore regarded as a sterile desert, has been discovered to consist largely of fertile regions, with some likelihood of a gold region existing in its Northern [illegible]

— General McClellan, so writes a Washington correspondent, is using untiring industry in getting the army into the best possible condition, while it is more and more evident, every day, that he does not mean to obtain military glory, but to carry out a plan similar to that of Scott—to quell this rebellion by a mighty pressure and not by a mighty slaughter.

— Refugees represent that in Winkley, Henderson, Carroll, and McNairy counties, Tennessee, the Union feeling is very strong. The inhabitants are only awaiting the approach of the national troops to make a general uprising.

— It is understood by the President that the Legislature of Kentucky will abolish slavery, reimbursing loyal masters.

— The World's dispatch says that small pox is getting prevalent by the carelessness of the Surgeon General in allowing cases of this disease to be in the same hospital with other patients.

— The Union Defence Committee of Chicago has expended $51,891 in equipping regiments and providing for volunteers' families.

— Brisk as is the recruiting for the Navy, it is not equal to the demand. One hundred and thirteen United States vessels are now fitting out, and 6,000 seamen are wanted to man them, while Com. Foote needs 1,000 men for his flotilla.

— Beaufort is still deserted by white men. Three Union gun-boats lie there, and others pass up and down the river occasionally. The negroes destroy and carry off everything they can lay their hands on. Pianos, mirrors, and other valuable property are ruthlessly destroyed. Anything they think useful they carry off to an island, where they are establishing a settlement of their own, and where they think they will be allowed to live in security. They have plenty of provisions. The crops are said to be heavier this year than for ten years past. The rice crop was secured before the arrival of the expedition.

— The Government has determined to open the ports of the counties on the eastern shore of Virginia to trade. These small ports have not really been blockaded. Their trade is almost exclusively coastwise with New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, to which cities they supply large quantities of oysters, kindling wood, and some grain and other articles. The eastern shore is fairly back in the Union, without hardly knowing that it had ever "been" seceded.

SPECIAL BOOK LIST.

The following works are especially adapted to the use of all preachers and Bible students. They are offered for sale at about half the publishers' prices, and cannot be had at these prices unless ordered soon.

This is a standard and valuable work, containing much information on history, prophecy and Scripture.

Buck's Theological Dictionary, fine binding, $1.50, (price $2.50,) postage 36 cts. Small edition, fine type, 75 cts; postage 20 cts.

A valuable dictionary of scriptural, doctrinal, and religious matters. This is the latest edition of a standard work.

S. H. Turner's Jewish Rabbies, 12mo.; cloth 75 cts., post paid.

This valuable treatise tells us just what we wish to know about the most noted Jewish teachers, their lives and times, and also gives their comments upon passages which predict the Messiah, thus proving out of their own mouths that Jesus is the Christ.

Beloe's Translation of Herodotus' Ancient History—the oldest in the world—"the father of History." $1.00, postage 30 cts.

This history is a fountain from which Rollin and all modern historians draw. It gives the most perfect ancient account extant of Egypt, Babylon, Persia, and the other ancient kingdoms extant. It was written about 430 B. C. and is valuable to all students of history.

Quin's Historical Atlas, quarto, half morocco binding, $5. (Price in London about $12.)

This Atlas contains 22 large maps of the world, at as many different periods, showing the progress of discovery, the rise of empires, the fall of the various kingdoms and nations. It contains historical sketches of each period, and gives at a glance the state of the empire at each period. The four kingdoms and their changes are here presented, with the history of the world in general. It is such a help, that no student of prophecy or history can afford to do without it. (Only two copies.) Sent by express.

Lorenzo Dow's Complete Works. One thick vol. 8vo. (price about $2.50) for $1.25, postage 30 cts. A favorable opportunity of obtaining the works of this eccentric and singular preacher.

The Apocryphal New Testament, 12 mo., 75 cts., postage 15 cts.

This book sustains to the New Testament a relation similar to that sustained by the Apocrypha to the Old Testament. It contains the genuine Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers, so far as they are known, and a number of spurious or fictitious treatises, histories and false gospels of an early age. The true portion shows the opinions of the early christians, and the false illustrates the character of the fables that superstitious men sought in vain to foist upon the church.

Dr. Cumming's Lectures on Daniel. English edition, cloth gilt, 62 cts., postage 18 cts., (price about $1.25.)

Orders should be sent, with the cash, to H. L. Hastings, Providence, R. I.

The Song of Deborah.—Judges 5.

TRANSLATED BY PROF. W. W. TURNER.

1. Then sung Deborah, and Barak the son of Abinoam, on that day, saying,
2. In that the leaders of Israel took the lead—
That the people willingly offered themselves,—
Praise ye the Lord.
3. Hear, O ye kings!
Give ear, O ye princes!
I, even I will sing unto the Lord;
I will sing praise to the Lord God of Israel.
4. Lord, when thou wentest out of Seir,
When thou marchedst out of the field of Edom,
The earth trembled, and the heavens dropped,
The clouds also dropped water.
5. The mountains melted before the Lord,
Even that Sinai before the Lord God of Israel.
6. In the days of Shamgar the son of Anath,
In the days of Joel, the highways were unoccupied, (or ceased, rested),
And the travelers walked through byways.
7. Rulers ceased, they ceased in Israel,
Until that I, Deborah, arose,
That I arose a mother in Israel.
8. He chose new gods;
Then was war in the gates:
Was there a shield or spear seen
Among forty thousand in Israel?
9. My heart is toward the commanders in Israel,
That offered themselves willingly to the people.
Bless ye the Lord!
10. Speak (or sing, celebrate their wondrous deeds,)
Ye that ride on white asses,
Ye that sit in judgment, (or, on carpets)
And walk by the way!
11. Because of the joyous voices of the dividers among the water troughs,*
There shall they rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord,
Even the righteous acts of his rule (or his rulers) in Israel:
Then the people of the Lord went down to the gates.
12. Awake, awake, Deborah!
Awake, awake, utter a song!
Arise, Barak!
And lead forth thy captives, thou son of Abinoam.
13. Then go down, the rest—the nobles, the people;
Go down for me, O Lord, among the mighty.
14. Out of Ephraim, whose seat (or rest) is with Amalek,
After thee, Benjamin, with thy troops;
Out of Machir came down commanders,
And out of Zebulun they that march with the musterer's staff.
15. And my princes in Issachar were with Deborah;
And as Issachar so Barak.
He (Issachar) was sent in his (Barak's) footsteps into the valley.
Among the streams of Reuben
There were great resolves of heart.
16. Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds,
To hear the pipings of the flocks?
Among the streams of Reuben
There were great deliberations of heart.
17. Gilead abode beyond Jordan:
And why did Dan remain in ships?
Asher continued on the sea-shore,
And abode in his harbors.
18. Zebulun is a people that scorned their life even unto death;
Napthali likewise in the high places of the field.
19. The kings came and fought,
Then fought the kings of Canaan
In Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo;
They took no spoil in silver.
20. They fought from heaven;
The stars in their courses fought against Sisera.
21. The river Kishon swept them away,
That ancient river, the river Kishon.
Tread down the strong ones, O my soul!
22. Then did the horsehoofs stamp
By the means of the prancings of his mighty ones.
23. Curse ye Meroz! said the angel of the Lord,
Curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof;
Because they came not to the help of the Lord,
To the help of the Lord against the mighty.
24. Blessed above women
Shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be,
Blessed shall she be above the women in the tent!
25. He asked water, and she gave him milk;
She presented curds in a lordly bowl.
26. She put her hand to the peg,
And her right hand to the workman's hammer:
And she hammered Sisera, she crushed his head,
And she mashed and broke through his temples.
27. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down:
At her feet he bowed, he fell:
Where he bowed, there he fell down killed.
28. The mother of Sisera looked out at a window,
And cried through the lattice,
Why is his chariot so long coming?
Why tarry the steps of his chariot?
29. The wise ones among her ladies answered her,
Yea, she returned answer to herself,
30. Have they not sped? have they not divided the spoil;
To every man a damsel or two,
To Sisera a spoil of dyed garments,
A spoil of dyed garments with embroidery,
A dyed vestment doubly embroidered, for the necks of the spoilers?
31. So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord!
But let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might.
And the land had rest forty years.

* i. e. Dividers of spoil.—Gesenius. Dividers of the flocks as they go to water.—De Rossi.

NOTE.—The above translation of this ancient song has never been printed. I have copied it from the author's original manuscript corrections in his interlined Bible, now in my library. Those who have interest enough in it to compare it with the common version, will perhaps think it worth preserving, especially as its author was a very profound and accurate oriental scholar. His Bible contains many thousands of emendations and new translations, especially on the poetical books of the Old Testament, all of which, I think, might be of value and interest to the public. If time permit, others may appear hereafter. H. L. HASTINGS.

BREADTH OF RELIGION.—Religion should influence its professor in all the relations of life. Whatever he does, he should do it the better for being a christian. Religion should make one a better student, a better servant, a better master, a better parent, a better child, a better man in all respects. The pious but eccentric Rowland Hill remarked, "He would not give a farthing for that man's religion whose cat and dog were not the better for it."

For the Crisis.

A Glance at our World.—No. 2.

Look at other states and conditions of men, to say nothing of kings and great men,—the rich, the mighty, or men in the middle grade of life, or those in a tolerable case,—all of whom are under this subjection more or less. But of the more wretched, many of whom have no remedy, they are under foot in society, and nobody is interested to raise them up; for this would be making companions of them, and that would be degrading; hence they must keep their own level, for they can never help each other up; and, if they could, they will not; they prefer all elevation and promotion themselves. Their conversation, relations, occupations, and habits of intercourse, hold them down like a mill-stone. They live in lanes and alleys, in the most filthy part of our cities, pent up in narrow apartments too numerous to agree well—this would be difficult even with some refinement—breathing impure air over and over again; and then the contiguity of so many uncleansed bodies becomes a cause often of disease, when their state becomes worse; and so they die, and no man careth for their soul. See them early in the morning, moving forth from their filthy habitations, unwashed, uncombed, clad in rags, with a filthy bag on their back, or basket on their arms, the most degraded scavengers strolling about the streets—caricatures of even degraded humanity.

O! to what depths poor humanity can be sunk in this ill-assorted world! And the reader cannot fail of exclaiming, as he glances about over this sin-polluted earth, "Thy kingdom come!" There are some who have a little better employment—in factories, forges, forests, and furnaces; on steamboats and locomotives; on stages, wagons, and the like. Some, it may be, are well paid; others are not. But in all these callings, there is more or less of moral and intellectual disability, exposure, and privation.

But go down into the deep, dark, damp, sulphurous coal pits of England, and you will find a company of doomed wretches—men, women, and children—who often for a whole life-time never see the light of day. There they go stooping under the low ceiling of the pit, sometimes lying on their backs or sides at work—women and girls attached to cars loaded with coal, crawling on their hands and knees through mud and water, often crippled for life by falling pieces of coal. Go to Virginia, and the coal mines of our own country in general, and you will find the same sufferings attending in a greater or less degree. In some cases they could find other employment; but the slaves of Virginia mines have no right of choice; they are doomed men, shut from the light of day, and the light of the blessed hope for which they are subjected to their dreadful captivity and bondage. These are the most miserable of all. They are allowed no choice; they have no will of their own; they can indulge in no hopes of release, but are confined in their prisons of total darkness, of damp and unhealthy vapors, and are seldom permitted to see the sun, or hear the singing birds, or smell the sweet flowers, or breathe the pure air of heaven. All is darkness and gloom, and well may they adopt the language of Job,—"When shall I arise and the night be gone?" It is night when they go to sleep,—all is night, and they cannot escape it.

> "God's image, disinherited of day,
> Here plunged in mines, forgets a sun was made."

Listen to Mr. Fletcher, in speaking of the condition of miners in these low and dreary vaults:—"All the elements seem combined against them. Destructive damps and clouds of noxious dust infest the air they breathe. Sometimes water incessantly distils on their naked bodies, or, bursting on them in streams, drowns them, and deluges their works. And frequently sulphurous vapors kindle in an instant by the light of their candles, and form subterraneous thunder and lightning. How fierce the rolling flames! how dreadful the continuous roar! how violent and fatal the explosion! Wonderful providence! some of the unhappy men have time to prostrate themselves; the fiery scourge grazes their backs; the ground shields their breasts. They escape! see them wound up out of the blazing dungeon, and say if those are not brands plucked out of the fire. Half dead, they hold in their arms their dead or dying companions."

Numerous instances are recorded like the above where many have lost their lives. Let us turn from the hardships attending a miner's life. See yonder bargemen hauling the loaded vessel against wind and tide. Since the dawn of day they have wrestled with the impetuous current, and it nearly overpowers them. How they task every nerve! how they are bathed in sweat and rain, fastened to their lines like horses to their traces! Wherein do they differ from that laborious brute? Not in each posture of body, for through the intenseness of their toil they bend forward, their head is foremost, and their hands on the ground. If there is any difference it is this: horses are indulged with a collar to secure the breast; but these, as if not worth preserving, draw without one;—the beasts trudge in patience and mutual harmony; but these men with loud contention and horrible imprecations. O sin! what hast thou done?

Is it not enough that these drudges should toil like beasts? Must they also curse one another like devils? If you have gone beyond the sound of their impious oaths, stop and consider the sons of Vulcan, confined to their forges and furnaces. Is their lot much preferable? A sultry air, and clouds of smoke and dust are the elements in which they labor. The confused noise of waters, falling steam, hissing fire, engines working, wheels turning, files creaking, hammers beating or bursting, and bellows roaring, form the dismal concert that strikes the ear; while a continual eruption of flames ascending from the mouth of their artificial volcanoes, dazzles the eye with a horrible glare. Massive bars of hot iron are the heavy tools they handle. Cylinders of the first magnitude, the enormous weights they heave; vessels full of melted metal, the dangerous loads they carry; the fiery wires they conduct into the deep cavities of the subterraneous moulds, and millions of flying sparks, with a thousand drops of liquid hissing iron, the horrible shower to which they are exposed. See them cast! You would think them in a bath, and not in a furnace. They bedew the burning sands with their streaming sweat, nor are their wet garments dried up either by the fires they attend. Certainly of all men these have reason to remember the first sentence of an offended God,—"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."

All nature is restless and uneasy, and every thing that has intelligence is intent on improving their condition. Science, genius, benevolence, philanthropy, are doing what they can to prevent, or to modify, or to neutralize the evils extant; and all intelligent christians, who carefully consult the great chart of Time, are looking for a remedy for the cares and sorrows thereof. Misfortunes greatly augment the sum of human wo. Pass round the world. Visit the hospitals and prisons, and every place that justice or mercy has provided for the punishment of the guilty, or for the relief of the afflicted in the town and the country—the world over—and you will see the same forms and grades of vice and suffering. If it be the prisons with the improvements of the 19th century, you will see a poor solitary wretch sitting in his narrow cell of perhaps six by eight or ten feet large, with a circular table turning upon a pivot through a crevice projecting in and out of his cell. His keeper puts food on the outer part, and by a whirl it is brought to the cell, and not a word is spoken. He is not allowed to hear the voice of his keeper; allowed no communication with any mortal for tedious years, until he must start at the sound of his own voice. A terrible punishment! J. L. H.

For the Crisis.

Mrs. Palmer on the Second Advent, &c.

BRO. GRANT:—For nearly twenty years we have been deeply interested in the writings and labors of Sr. Palmer, wife of Dr. Palmer of New York. Every month I have the privilege of reading a report of her labors in England, and have occasionally copied extracts for the Crisis. For some time past, we have noticed remarks from her pen, which indicated an interest in the signs of the times, and return of the Nobleman, but were not certain that she regarded the coming as personal. My last "Guide to Holiness," however, contains a letter which clearly defined her position, and enabled me cordially to welcome her to the Advent band. It is so interesting, that I copy a portion for the benefit of the readers of the Crisis, many of whom are familiar with her works on Holiness. Mrs. Palmer says:—

"You know something of what have been my views for many years in regard to the period of the world in which we live. My conviction deepens that the drama of this world's history is fast winding up. Is not the great tribulation spoken of by Daniel coming upon us? I have no sympathy with those who would fix the day or hour of the coming of our Lord. But I am free to acknowledge, that during the past twenty years I have prayerfully been comparing Scripture with Scripture on the subject of the Lord's second coming. All Scripture is given by inspiration. The Scriptures on the topic are for our instruction in righteousness. And because some misguided people have erred in opinion and spirit on this theme, the prince of this world would fain turn aside the attention of sincere christians from prayful scriptural investigation. Though it is written, 'Of that day and hour knoweth no man;' yet our incarnate Lord, in answer to the inquiries of his disciples, gave certain signs which should precede his coming, and said, 'When ye shall see all these things come to pass, know that it is near, even at the doors.' And why should he give these signs, if it were not important that we should observe them? He reproved those Scribes and Pharisees who did not take pains to observe the signs of his first coming. Had they done so, they might have been prepared for its solemn issues.

Perhaps you wonder when I say that though I have been so long interested, I have not studied human authors largely upon the subject. But to my mind there is that which is so emphatic in the Scriptures of truth on this solemn, yet glorious theme, that I am amazed christians of the present day do not feel more like the early christians, who would fain have hastened the day by their eager longing for it. They were told that a falling away must first come, and the Man of Sin, who exalteth himself above all that is called God, must be revealed. Surely,

> 'The plagues, the noise, the din of war,
> Our Saviour's swift approach declare,
> And speak his kingdom near;
> His chariot will not long delay,
> [illegible]
> Triumphant Lord, appear.'

In my searchings on this subject, I judge also from analogy, scripturally, seven is a perfect number. Seventh day is first spoken of as hallowed to the Lord, seventh week, seventh year, etc. Each dispensation has lasted about two thousand years. First the Antediluvian era, then the Mosaic, and now we are hastening toward the completion of the two thousand years since the morning of the Spirit's dispensation dawned upon us, of which Peter, while speaking as the Spirit gave utterance said, 'This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel; and it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, etc.

Paul, in referring to the solemnity of the age in which he lived, says, we 'upon whom the ends of the world are come.' If the apostles while writing through the direct inspiration of the Holy Ghost could refer thus to the point of time in which he was living, what may we think of that in which we live? Are we not living in the Saturday evening times? 'One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.' May we not anticipate some wondrous change as the seven thousandth year opens upon us! And what shall this great change be? As far as the light of scripture beams upon my own mind, I seem to see in the dim distance the dawning of the millennial glory; the coming of him whose right it is to reign; the new heavens and new earth; the ushering in of the grand Sabbatic year; the saint's jubilee; when those who have attained a part in the first resurrection shall live and reign with Christ a thousand years. But I have unexpectedly permitted my pen to run on in the contemplation of this glorious subject, until I have little room for anything else."

I will close this lengthy extract with a brief one respecting the success of their labors.

"Our visits, in regard to time, have averaged from twenty to thirty days; seldom exceeding this. Often have we from two to three hundred saved weekly, and scarcely do we remember to have at any place, however small, but we have on the whole one hundred blest on an average each week. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things."

Hymn.

> Thy word, my gracious God, I love,
> It is my chief delight,
> A lamp to guide my wayward feet
> To realms of endless light.
> Oh! let me still new beauties see,
> And fit me for the sight;
> And as the day of God draws nigh,
> Let evening-tide be light.
> And should I lie in death's embrace
> Before that day shall dawn,
> Oh! may I rise in glad surprise
> On resurrection morn.
> But if it be thy will, my God,
> That I should live to see
> The bright appearance of my Lord
> In life and victory,—
> May I with all the living saints
> Go forth to meet my King,
> And, clothed in immortality,
> His praise forever sing.

For the Crisis.

My Pilgrimage—No. 2.

I left my readers a long way back on North river, waiting for the young collegian to get his reinforcements; but he having failed in this, I rested very quietly the remainder of the way, and had no more encounters save now and then a splendid reconnoisance from some of the aforesaid party. I found lodgings again in Albany with Bro. Nichols. I had heard that the little band in Albany were broken up, but I found it far otherwise. A more loving little company I seldom find. I heard the remark, as I passed out of the Hall Sabbath noon, "See how these brethren love one another!" I had a good time with them, and trust a profitable one to them. Here I found Bro. Blackman, of Methodist notoriety, among the Adventists. I had got a wrong impression from some cause concerning him, but have since learned among my own relatives that his character is unexceptional. He is most esteemed where he is the best known.

I left this little company with a light heart, much encouraged for the "fight." Spent one night in Goshen among the loved ones, we trust to profit. We attended the Conference at Worcester, and learned many things which we hope will be profitable to us hereafter. I visited Putnam next; had a good time, though I was almost ahead of my appointment; thence to Providence; here I found some tried friends; they seemed to gain new strength as we talked of things "that are, and the things that shall be hereafter." From Providence we went to River Point, and regretted that we were obliged to leave so soon. O that ministers would attend to the specific work for which we are called to make ready a people prepared for His coming!

Some of the churches are starving to death on practical and doctrinal preaching. Brethren, we must keep up with the times if we would be thoroughly furnished unto every good word and work. Yesterday's newspaper is good for nothing to-day. Let us get something fresh from the fountain every day; then hearers don't get sleepy during preaching if you do talk an hour and a half. If preachers have sensation sentences and sermons, I think half an hour is quite too long; but if fact and sentiment, and that timely, there is no danger of weakening the bone and sinew of the church by long sermons. I hear sometimes of great revivals under two or three sermons; but I find it ofttimes like a [illegible] shower; its effect lasts only while it is [illegible].

We came to Danielsonville, the [illegible] inst., and commenced our labors. We had an interesting time with this people; we continued our meeting for eight evenings, including two Sabbaths, the interest increasing from the beginning. Since we left we learn that there is much interest to hear more on "these things." We have much reason to thank the Lord for directing us to Danielsonville. We returned home in time for the Discussion with Mr. Baker, which continued four evenings with a good hearing and interest.

We met all the scriptures which he adduced bearing on the question, and showed that all promises to man concerning the future were conditional. This he at length acknowledged, so that it remained for him to show that all men would comply with the conditions, which he failed to do, leaving all the testimony with his acknowledgment on the one side of the question. He strove to prove, or rather asserted, that we were in the New Jerusalem state. But, as that was shown to be a deathless state, facts disapproved of that position. He then asserted that we were in the world, or age to come, of which Christ and the apostles spake, as we had passed out of the Jewish age; but as that was shown to be an age where they neither marry nor are given in marriage, this also proved false. He then strove to divert the attention of the people to the definition of terms, but dare not make an application of his terms to one single text of scripture, and being hard pushed, he ridiculed my faith, and spake diminutively of my character, as he "presumed" it was; but I was at home, so no damage in this direction. He said that Christ's teaching with regard to the strait gate and narrow way to life had reference to the moral attainments in this life, and that the fire of which I had spoken was that refining fire which would purify the spirit after death, and bring out all its nobler qualities. We then showed how it purified Sodom, and that was set forth as an ensample to them that should afterward live ungodly, and how it would purify the proud by bringing them to ashes, and the wicked by consuming them into smoke, &c., &c., and as he scouted the idea of a literal resurrection, he did not believe in the salvation of any man, for man died, and unless there was a resurrection of the dead, even those that had fallen asleep in Christ were perished; and as to the soul, (though that was no part of the question) it was said that the soul that sinneth it should die; and as to the spirit, it was simply the motive power, and was no part of man, hence nothing to do with the question. By his own concessions, the future life was on conditions, and by denying the literal resurrection of the dead, he admitted all, yea more than I claimed in the affirmative of the question, ("Will any portion of mankind cease to be?) and sought refuge in the assumption that the spirit would be refined in those purifying fires till its pure qualities were developed, and Christ would be all and in all. I showed, if this little, intangible, indivisible, uncompounded, immatorial, simple essence should escape, it was no part of man, and as it was so infinitely incomprehensible, it could hardly be worth saving any way.

And now having learned that all the hope of Universalism is in the purifying after death of the immortal, intangible, indivisible, uncompounded, immaterial, corrupt little spirit, by an immaterial fire of immaterial brimstone, till its little immateriality shall develope its pure immaterial qualities, I feel nothing but pity for them, and would pray, unless God has sent them this strong delusion that they might believe a lie and be damned because they received not the truth in the love of it, that they might anoint their eyes, that they might see that the wages of sin is death, and that the gift of God is eternal life through (obeying) Jesus Christ. Amen. H. PRATT.

Selections.

Evil Speaking.

Evil speaking, like smoking cigars or, like profane swearing, often becomes a habit. By habit, we mean all things that men slide into with great facility, practice readily without thinking, and get out of, if ever at all, with great difficulty. Persons who are a little selfishly inclined, fall into this habit of evil speaking with astonishing facility. What they say against their neighbor seems to them so true—certainly somebody ought to say it. If other people had as much independence as themselves, and as much abhorrence of wrong, they too would speak out against the evil things of their neighbors. So they take to themselves the honor of being special champions of virtue and censors of wrong. Each shaft hurled against a neighbor's sin is silently passed to the credit of their own virtue. The quiet assumption is that I never do or say what I condemn in my neighbor. This assumption is often the seasoning which makes evil speaking palatable, until habit shall have blunted the nicer moral sensibilities.

The temptations to evil speaking ought to be studied. In some minds it is first tolerated, then loved as giving vent to a just indignation against supposed wrong. To others it has attractions as putting their own better ways in the light of a contrast. To others of strong talking proclivities, it has the charm of an exhaustless topic; it always supplies them something to say, just as tobacco supplies certain men something to chew, and as profanity helps men to be very emphatic and very smart of speech. That becomes a temptation which agreeably meets and fills some want.

But some one will say, What's the harm? Why may we not speak the evil that is in our neighbors?

You may—sometimes, in a certain spirit, for certain ends, and in a certain way. You may—in the spirit of true love to him—for the sake of doing him good and in the way best adapted to this end. Certainly, neither God nor reason shuts you off from any suitable efforts to correct apparent evils, and to reclaim your apparently erring friend. The Scriptures have even defined the excellent method in this case. "If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone." That is it. You may speak of his evil to him—your heart being full of love and yearning to reclaim a straying friend. But you will observe this is quite different from a general warrant to speak evil of your neighbor behind his back, and to any and every body whose ear you can gain.

Certainly the Lord is willing you should do all the good you can, and all you can to suppress and cure existing evils. But he does not wish you to bring a curse upon your own soul by causeless and selfish evil speaking.

And this opens the way to remark that one of the most fearful elements in the habit of evil-speaking, is its self-depraving power. It surely eats out of the soul all those kindly sentiments of well-wishing for others' good in which virtue finds its life and joy.

The man or the woman who forms the habit of evil speaking must learn to enjoy it. This point gained, they certainly cannot enjoy the good reputation and the real welfare of their fellow-beings. The law of their moral progress is toward finding their own good in others' grief and trouble—building up self on the ruin they can make of others' good name.

In the end, this sin of evil speaking brings down a terrible retribution, for society must, in self defence, spue out the slanderer; and in the nature of the case his resources for happiness within himself are turned to gall. Poor man!

So let us earnestly recommend that you resist this practice before it becomes a habit. Compel your tongue, if it speaks at all, to speak well of your neighbor; it will do you good. Say all the good of each neighbor that you can find to say. It will not only make your neighborhood more pleasant, but your own soul more benevolent and more pure.—Ob. Evangelist.

Be a Man of your Word.

When you promise to do a thing, do it. Be a man of principle in your word. Do not say that you intend to-day to visit your sick friend or neighbor, and then suffer the pressure of business to crowd it out of your mind. He has been watching for your coming during the week that is past. Could you have seen the bright smile that illumined his countenance when he said, "I hear his voice—his footstep on the stair," you would have said that the keeping of that promise was worth more to you than much "choice gold." But when the vision had disappeared, and you came not, there was pity and sorrow, even for you, written upon those features. For dollars and cents had become a formidable barrier against that priceless gem, in every man's character, which either shines in its own conspicuous light of love of the truth, or is set in the midnight darkness of distrust and falsehood. Then, if you wish to do good, and wield an influence for truth, be a man of your word. For truth is the essence of heaven.

DOWN, ARE YOU FLAT ON YOUR BACK?—Is it a wonder? Is it not rather a wonder you kept on your legs as long as you did? No church and society can live and prosper without a regular stated meeting for prayer and testimony. Prayer is the mainspring, the thermometer of a church. Churches after churches languish and die, dwindle, breathe less and less, till they expire! simply by neglecting to assemble statedly and pour out the soul in fervent, united supplication for the minister and people—the outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

Beloved, forget not the assembling yourselves together as the manner of some is. Keep the fire burning on the altar of your hearts continually; meet at least once or twice weekly in the capacity of a prayer meeting—and beside this gather the little ones into the Sabbath school—else "Ichabod" or "Mene Tekel" is sure to be written on the walls of your sanctuary!—Ex.

IT CAN'T BE DONE.—To attempt to convince a man that he is wrong in a matter of opinion, by calling him a fool, or an ignoramus, is to practice that kind of logic, the force of which it is very hard to bring to bear upon the minds of the people. A man does not like to be called a fool; and this calling of names never made a man less a fool or an ignoramus, in his own mind, nor affected the influence of his opinions upon the minds of others. Opinions are obstinate things. They will not be denounced out of the way, but must be met and conquered, if at all, by other and stronger opinions. To do this to the best advantage, be courteous, be kind; meeting argument with argument, like reasoning and reasonable creatures, not endeavoring to establish opinions by the use of Billingsgate slang.

GOOD HABITS.—There are four good habits—punctuality, accuracy, steadiness and dispatch. Without the first of these time is wasted; without the second, mistakes the most hurtful to our credit and interest, and that of others may be committed; without the third, nothing can be well done; and without the fourth, opportunities of great advantage are lost, which it is impossible to recal.

Youth's Department.

God's Property.

"I would not put that string in the fire, Katy," said Aunt Eva, "it may come useful sometime."

"Why, auntie, we are getting such bits of twine all the time around parcels, and it does not seem worth while to save them all. They look untidy lying about."

"Certainly, my dear, but I would not let them lie about. I would roll them all nicely into a ball, tying the ends together."

"Still we get so many we could never use half of them."

"You can lay them by in some convenient place and let them wait until they are wanted. 'Such things neither eat nor drink,' grandmother used to say, and may be of use to some one else, if not to us. All the little boys around 'Evergreen Cottage' know where to come for a kite-string or a fish-line, and I can accommodate them without any trouble or expense by only a minutes' forethought when my parcels come. It may seem a little gift, but if, it is the right thing at the right time, it is more valuable than a costlier gift which is of no service to us. Besides, I am not so sure you will never want them, Katy. I remember how lovely those morning-glories looked climbing about the windows last summer when I was here. Did you buy the strings for them to run up on, or did you have them in the house?"

"I had a few, but I bought the most of them. It only cost ten cents, though, the whole of it."

"Yet that ten cents would have bought a whole New Testament, which you could have given to some poor factory child. I presume there are many in those long tenement rows who never owned this priceless treasure, nor their parents before them."

"But, auntie, Lina Morris says it is only mean people who are so careful about saving things. She wears her light gaiters out in the mud, throws away great slices of pound cake sometimes, and the other day wiped up some ink she had spilled on her desk with a beautiful cambric handkerchief."

"That proves her a wasteful, very untidy, and silly little girl. I am sure Katy has been too well taught to ever take such a person for a model. Whenever you are tempted to waste even a trifle which might be of use to any one, just say to yourself, 'It is God's property,' and you will find it an excellent aid to economy."—S. S. Advocate.

For the Crisis.

Hymn for the Children.

The following hymn, it will be remembered by some of the children who read the Crisis, was sung by them at the camp-meeting at Wilbraham. It is worthy of being committed to memory, and often repeated, as it brings to mind the duty of prayer, which it is to be hoped every child engages in, both morning and evening.

And while speaking of the camp meeting, will not every little boy and girl, who was at the meeting last fall, come to the next one, if one we should have, and get as many more to come as they can? As I promised, I will have the hymn set to music, and perhaps some other ones; also a supply of Sabbath school papers, so that every one can have a copy. D. N. SMITH.

PRAYER.

> "Wake, little child, the morn is gay,
> The air is fresh and cool;
> But pause awhile, and kneel to pray,
> Before you go to merry play,
> Before you go to school.
> Kneel down, and speak the holy words:
> God loves your simple prayer,
> Above the sweet songs of the birds,
> The bleating of the gentle herds,
> The flowers that scent the air.
> And when the quiet evenings come,
> And dew drops wet the sod,
> When bats and owls begin to roam,
> And flocks and herds are driven home,
> Then kneel again to God.
> Because you need him day and night,
> To shield you with his arm;
> To help you always to do right,
> To feed your soul and give you light,
> And keep you safe from harm."

The Last Reading.

In one of the coal mines of England, a youth about fifteen years of age, was working by the side of his father, who was a pious man, and governed and educated his family according to the word of God.

The father was in the habit of carrying with him a small pocket Bible, and the son, who had received one at the Sunday school, imitated his father in this. Thus he always had the sacred volume with him, and whenever he enjoyed a season of rest from labor, he read it by the light of his lamp. They worked together in a newly opened section of the mine, and the father had just stepped aside to procure a tool, when the arch above them suddenly fell between them, so that his father supposed his child to be crushed. He ran toward the place and called to his son, who at length responded from under a dense mass of earth and coal.

"My son," cried the father, "are you living?"

"Yes, father, but my legs are under a rock."

"Where is your lamp, my son?"

"It is still burning, father."

"What will you do, my dear son?"

"I am reading my Bible, father, and the Lord strengthens me."

These were the last words of that Sunday scholar; he was soon suffocated.

THE CRISIS is devoted to the exposition of Bible truth; especially, the doctrine of the kingdom; personal coming and reign of Christ on the earth; holiness of heart; the unconscious state of the dead; their literal resurrection, and the final destruction of the wicked.

For the Crisis.

"Ever with the Lord."

The Lord himself descends
From heaven with loud command,
Angels his car attend,
They fly o'er sea and land:
The trump of God, the angels' voice,
Awakes the saints to endless joys.

The dead in Christ arise,
Waked by their Master's call;
They see him in the skies,
Exalted over all:
Rising, they meet him in the air,
And swell their hallelujahs there.

So shall we ever be
With Christ our glorious Lord;
So we his face shall see,
According to his word:
So shall we to his presence come,
And ever dwell with him at home.

For the Crisis.

A SERMON.
The Science of Grafting; or, how Men get into the Christ.

BY E. V. LYON.

(Concluded.)

"Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."—2 Cor. 5: 17.

This brings me in the second place to speak of some of the signs which are unavoidably hung out around the dwelling of him who is in the Christ. The man who is engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, will have the signs around his dwelling, viz., men clothed in rags, with blackened eyes, bloated faces and haggard countenances, etc., etc. And he might as well undertake to hurl the sun from its orbit, or annihilate the starry floor which the Maker of the Universe has made and spread over our heads, as to prevent these signs from being seen. So with the man who is in the Christ. "He is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." If the text read all old things, I should forever despair of being saved. A very pious and devoted lady once remarked to a brother in the ministry:—"Bro. ——, I do not think you are fully sanctified to the Lord." "Why not?" said the brother. She replied, "Your eyes look too roguish." The brother asked her "if she thought that the grace of God would change the complexion of a man's eyes?" She replied, "Yes." Now this is a mistaken idea, that the so-called religious world have fallen into. The man who is of a snailish motion, will have the same motion after he gets into the Christ. The man who has a cheerful countenance, full of life and animation, and is making a stir in the world, will have the same organization after he gets into the Christ; and the same cheerful and happy countenance he will generally wear; and by the blessing of God he will make a stir wherever he goes. But if he was disposed to play the part of a hypocrite by "disfiguring his face," like the Pharisees of old, it will be necessary for him to watch himself closely, or he will be liable to get on the same disgustful look, and thereby bring the cause of truth into disrepute.

The grace of God does not change the physical organization of man, but only turns it in another direction; viz., the way that leads to Mt. Zion, the city of the living God. "Old things are passed away." If he has been in the habit of speaking falsely to his fellow men, or if he has been guilty of taking a dishonest course with them, either in religious or worldly matters, he lays aside this course of conduct, because he has "renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but commending" himself "to every man's conscience in the sight of God." He has done speaking lightly of that Being who has spoken all things into existence by the fiat of his word; who, out of love to the human family, has given his Son, "that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life"; who has given his word, which tells us all about that Son, all about His own character, and presents to us in glowing colors the great plan of salvation which he has devised, whereby sinful and corruptible men may be saved from their sins and finally be made immortal, and come into the possession of this earth which we now inhabit,—in its restored state,—and bask forever amid the sunbeams of an endless day!

He has done speaking lightly of His Son, who bore his "sins in his own body on the tree," and by whose "stripes" he has been "healed"—or of His word—or of His people—or of a throne of grace. Over this course of conduct he now mourns and laments, but rejoices that he has obtained pardon through the Christ; by believing the things concerning Him and the kingdom of God, and "obeying from the heart that form of doctrine" by which he was brought into the state of death in figure, that the blood of Jesus might be figuratively applied to him; and thereby he has been cleansed from all sin. (See Acts 2: 33, 1 John 1: 7, Acts 22: 16, Heb. 9: 14, 22.) If he has been in the habit of using alcoholic drinks intemperately,—of rising in the morning and calling his wife and children around the sideboard, to take with him the morning dram; this course of conduct is laid aside forever. The Holy Bible, the songs of Zion, and other books possessing a character in keeping with truth, are now occupying the place of the decanters. An altar has been erected to the living God, in the name of Jesus; and around it, at the hour of prayer, he is seated, and by his side is to be seen his loving companion, with a cheerful countenance, and by her side a cheerful company of little urchins, who listen with profound attention whilst a portion of the Living Oracles is read;—when around that altar they all bow with profound reverence, as the venerable sire offers up an humble petition for himself and family to the Father of mercies, in the name of Jesus, for just such things as he has promised to give to his elect. A change has been wrought in him by the truths of God, which is visible to all, making the language of my text true, "Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."

The character of God has become a new and pleasant theme of contemplation to him. All his attributes are lovely, his ways glorious, his works adorable; and often in his nightly walks he is wrapped up in holy vision as he gazes upon the starry floor which Jehovah hath made and hung out over our heads. His plan of redemption is a theme on which he delights to dwell, and is often lost to all around in holy contemplation. Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who was once to him "as a root out of dry ground, without form or comeliness that he should desire him," is now the "chiefest among ten thousand, and the one altogether lovely." On Him he looks by faith as he hung on yonder cross, bleeding, groaning, dying, amid the loud sobs and tears of a beloved mother and a heart-broken company of disciples. The heavens gather blackness, and all nature is clad in mourning. An awful spell comes over his mind; at length it is broken, and, like the sweet singer in Israel, he is led to cry out, "Come, all ye that fear the Lord, and I will declare unto you what he has done for my soul." His heart is filled with joy, because he can now realize in part the value of what Geo. Whitfield called "the believer's golden chain!" "But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption: that, according as it is written, he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord." He now looks upon Jesus as "the way, the truth, and the life"; as "the resurrection and the life"; as the "Alpha," and the "Omega"—that is, the beginning of the believer's life, and the completion of it;—the MEDIUM appointed by the Father through which future or spirit life is to come to him. "The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." And often in his midnight musings he is led to adopt the language of the poet:

"Thou art the way—to thee alone
From sin and death we flee;
And he who would the Father seek,
Must seek him, Lord, by thee.

Thou art the truth—thy word alone
True wisdom can impart;
Thou only canst inform the mind,
And purify the heart.

Thou art the life—the rending tomb
Proclaims thy conquering arm;
And those who put their trust in thee,
Nor death nor hell shall harm.

Thou art the way, the truth, the life!
Grant us that way to know,
That truth to seek, that life to win,
Whose joys eternal flow."

The Bible, which has been of little interest to him, is now the book of books; and he looks upon it as an infallible rule by which he is to be guided as he wends his way through sorrow's vale to the highlands of glory!

"Every sentence—oh how precious!
Every line is full of love."

Hour upon the back of hour does he now spend in perusing its sacred pages, comparing scripture with scripture, for the purpose of arriving at the truth; marking a passage here, and another there, which has often afforded him strong consolation. And the language of his heart will be—

"My Bible leads to glory!"

Often in his way-side musings is he led to adopt the language of David,—"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path"; and also, "Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee." "Sweeter" to my taste "than honey, yea, than the honey-comb." "O how I love thy law! (the Word); it is my meditation all the day." He loves the place most dearly where that word, or the gospel, is proclaimed in its purity and simplicity; and no sacrifice on his part is too great, in order to reach the place where it is proclaimed, or to give the proclamation of it to his fellow men, who have never heard it in its purity,—the coming of Jesus in the combined glory of all Heaven to raise the righteous dead and change the righteous living from mortality to immortality, and overthrow all anti-christian powers, and establish the throne or empire in Mt. Zion, and usher in the day looked for by patriarchs, prophets, and apostles; when the redeemed of all ages shall in harmony meet, each other to greet, and on fair, Eden's towering heights stand and strike the key-note in redemption's song, and bask forever amid the sunshine of an endless day; hand in hand walk beside those "crystal waters," and gather fruit from life's fair tree, which will grow on either side of the river of life, as it runs through the Paradise of God.

The people of God are now his favorite ones; and the language of his heart is that of Ruth's to Naomi,—"Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God; where thou diest, will I die." And this love to the brethren is made a sure sign, by one of the sacred writers, that he who possesses it is in the Christ. "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." And to make it still more sure, the Apostle has said, "By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God and keep his commandments." And in order to make it a three-fold cord which cannot be broken, "This is the love of God, that we keep His commandments"; "and in keeping of them there is great reward." He has become allied to a throne of grace; and you might as well undertake to chain the forked lightning, or drown the noise of the rumbling thunder, as to prevent him from praying! The fiery furnace could not do it, nor the lion's den, neither the stocks and the inner prison, into which Paul and Silas were cast after they had been beaten with stripes. His mode of living is changed altogether. He lives not to gratify self, but to glorify God in his body and spirit, which he now considers are His,—by a course of action which is in perfect keeping with the great principles of the law of right. The widow, the fatherless, the hungry, the naked, the sick, and the destitute, and Afric's sable sons who are wearing the galling yoke of slavery, are not forgotten by him. Glory be to God! that there are unmistakable signs hung out around the individual who is in the Christ.

In conclusion, we remark, that our only safety is in the Christ, from the fact that we are mortal, Job 4: 17,—"Shall mortal man be more just than God?"—consequently corruptible, and liable any hour to fall under the power of disease, and be conquered by death. Have any of you a lease from the Almighty that you will live to see another year? Dare any of you take the position that you will live another month, another week, or even an hour? Death may be feeling for thine heart-strings! Do not those sparkling eyes grow dim, and those rosy cheeks pale and emaciated? Perhaps the screws are already made which are to fasten down the lid of thy coffin—the boards sawed and seasoned of which your coffin will be made—the cloth made and bleached of which your shroud is to be made;—this very night thy life may be required of thee, and you are yet in your sins, consequently in danger of that death from which none will ever rise. Solemn thought! Who can endure it? How dare you procrastinate this important work?

Finally, the Judge standeth before the door. Not that I claim to know the day nor the hour of his coming, neither do I believe that it is revealed in his word,—yet his coming is nigh, and "hasteth greatly!" Multitudes are alive who will survive the pale nations of the dead till he comes. A little in the distance, and you will see the heavens depart and roll together as a scroll—the Son of God vacating his Father's throne, clothed in robes of royalty, stepping into the car of glory, whose wheels shall in fire roll down the burning path-way of the heavens, surrounded by myriads of angels,—the heavens are lit up with his glory! Hark! the trump of God is sounding; the graves of the saints are all opened. See them

"Rise from land and ocean!"

Listen to their loud alleluias as they are borne along upon the breeze and fall upon the ears of the lost, who are to fall beneath the ire of the "wrath of the Lamb." No way for them to escape! No, no! Proffered mercy they have slighted; solemn warnings they have rejected, and the dread hour has come!! O! how important it is that you at once, whilst mercy lingers, and all Heaven is waiting to be gracious, enter the rock which has been cleft, that, in the day of the Lord's coming, you may be found among those who will escape the storm of vengeance which will sweep this wide world over, and chase the wicked out of the world; and stand complete in Christ, dressed in white; in your hand the victor's palm; yours the white robe, the conqueror's song, and Eden's blissful plains; and with the shining hosts of God's elect walk amid its beautiful groves, where you will bask forever in the sunbeams of an endless day!

NOTE. The above discourse was delivered at Port Perry and Toronto, C. W. And it is by the request of the church of God at P. and the brethren at T. that it has been written out and presented to the public. And it is the ardent desire of the author that the blessing of God may attend its perusal.

For the Crisis.

A Prayer.

Thou God who reignest in heaven above,
We humbly bow the knee;
And, trusting in our Father's love,
Our boon would ask of thee:

Events throughout the groaning earth
Proclaim thy judgments near;
And never, since creation's birth,
Has thy light shone so clear.

Swift as the rolling wheel of Time
Could bring them up to view,
Events, in every age and clime,
Have proved thy word is true.

Nations long blest with peace profound
Now break the magic charm,
And mighty armies shake the ground
Amid war's dread alarm.

They gather for the last great fight—
'Tis Armageddon's war!
And in the gloom of earth's dark night
They'll fall to rise no more.

A drowsy world still slumbers on,
Nor heeds the warning call,
Which loud through all the world has gone,
A witness unto all.

Thy saints behold the threat'ning cloud,
And, moved with godly fear,
To Thee, their helper, cry aloud—
Wilt thou vouchsafe to hear?

That awful day comes on apace,
Thy judgments hasten fast;
Then hide us in some secret place
Until thy wrath be past!

Great Wickedness.

BY S. S. BREWER.

"Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe: come, get ye down, for the press is full, the fats overflow, for their wickedness is great."—JOEL.

It is not the fact, as some erroneously imagine, that crime is restricted to the poor and lowly in circumstances. A writer some few years since wrote thus:—"THE ROYAL FAMILY OF RUSSIA.—The following amiable family picture may be interesting at this time, when Russia is thrusting her ursine nose into politics of Europe: Peter I., the founder, as he is called, of the present Imperial family, was the murderer of the two daughters and the son of his brother Ivan; and the murderer, it is asserted, according to annalists of his reign, by his own hand, of Alexis. He was himself murdered by Menzikoff, the favorite of his wife Catharine, who, when united to Peter, was already the wife of a living husband, and their children were afterward declared incapable of reigning because born in sin. Anna, the eldest daughter of Ivan, put to death fourteen thousand Russians, and banished twice as many. A revolution displaced the young Ivan to put on the throne Elizabeth, daughter of Peter I., and her reign was remarkable for her drunkenness and debauchery. Peter III., her successor, was notoriously the offspring of crime, and was dethroned and strangled by his wife, Catharine II., the same infamous woman who assassinated the dethroned Emperor Ivan, and whose own son, Paul, the father of the present Emperor Nicholas, was strangled by courtiers."

This may be called abominable wickedness in high places. We will now proceed to contrast low life in low places, with the above low life in high places. The following is from a work published a few years since, entitled

"MISERIES OF LONDON.—The following is a description of a single lane called Church Lane, in the city of London, within the limits of St. Giles, as described by a member of a committee appointed to examine its condition: 'The lane is three hundred feet long, and contains thirty-two houses. It is lighted by three gas lights, and water is supplied three times a week, but no tanks or tubes were found. I simply describe two or three houses that we visited, as a fair average of the whole. Many things [illegible] too disgusting to enter the col[illegible] a newspaper, and therefore I shall only give some leading facts. The first house that the committee visited contained fifty-four persons, only six rooms, and twelve beds! windows broken—filth abundant. In the second there were fifty-six persons, and only three beds. In the third there were sixty-one persons and nine beds, averaging nearly seven to a bed, those of all ages, sexes and conditions!'

This is as horrible a state of things as ever one could imagine to exist, and it is a stern fact there is no virtue in shutting one's eyes to it. A majority of the windows were broken, and the cold night wind could not fail to sweep in and inflict colds and consumption upon its inmates. The occupants of this miserable class are of great variety; some are fruit dealers, some sweeps, some knife grinders, some mendicants, some crossing sweepers, some street singers, and many thieves and prostitutes.

The committee say in their report:—'In these wretched dwellings, all ages and both sexes, fathers and daughters, mothers and sons, grown up brothers and sisters, strangers, adult males and females, and swarms of children;—the sick, the dying and the dead, are all huddled together with a proximity and mutual pressure which brutes would resist, where it is physically impossible to observe the ordinary decencies of life, where all sense of propriety and self-respect must be lost.' Such is the state of Church Lane! would that it were alone in its notoriety! Alas! there are many others quite as bad."

Truly, there is great suffering connected with such brutal depravity. See Eccl. 1: 13. What a sight for a virtuous and refined christian to witness! hoary headed and juvenile pupils wallowing in the slime of degradation! O come, Lord Jesus, and bring the wickedness of the wicked to a perpetual end.

Crime is not confined to minors in the old country. I could extend these articles to a vast extent in presenting the reports of different police departments. A very few in connection with the above must answer at this time.

"YOUTH IN NEW YORK.—The New York Herald speaking of crime in that city, says:—In other countries youth is frivolous, reckless, impetuous, ardent, hot-headed; in New York it seems to be brutal, cold-blooded, treacherous, savage, cowardly. Abroad, the more heinous crimes of the calendar—murders, rapes, arson—are invariably the work of men hardened in crime; here they are the achievements of youths who are just at the age when the heart is believed to be the most generous, and the feelings kindest. Our boys pass from the school-house to the Tombs."

The N. Y. Journal of Life Illustrated, edited by L. N. Fowler, of Oct. 31, 1857, contains an article entitled "Features of New York Life, Swindlers and Thieves," from which we extract the following:

"It is now two o'clock in the morning, and the city is almost in a state of repose. . . . We will stop in one of the houses of Baxter street; and as a suspicious looking individual with a large bundle has just entered, we will slip in with him. It is a large, filthy room, with little eating tables distributed through it, at some of which are seated the most villainous looking crowd in christendom. All ages and all sexes are there; and though the youthful predominates, yet in vain we look into their countenances for the simplicity and ingenuousness belonging to the young. The visible impress of sin and dissipation has destroyed every indication of innocence, and left the features repulsive and prematurely aged. Some of them are aged men; and around them are seated or standing a crowd of young of both sexes, to whom they are relating some of their past exploits with the jimmy or nippers, or probably instructing in some new method by which to rob and defraud. . . . They are drinking, eating, cursing, or probably those who are whispering together in that remote corner are planning a burglary for to-morrow night. Thus they go in and out continually, until broad day light, from this eating house and thieves' den. The keepers of these houses will conceal the thieves when they are pursued, and will enter bail for them when detected and in the clutches of the law. There is an estimate, and we think it scarcely enough, of fifteen thousand thieves in New York; and we include those only who obtain their full livelihood by that means, and not those who incidentally follow it while carrying on other pursuits. Many of them commence their dishonest practice almost after leaving their swaddling clothes, for we have seen them taken to the station houses as young as four years of age.

True religion and morality are as much unknown to the vicious part of this city, as a general thing, as to the most heathenish nation in Christendom. Let our divines who are anxious to become true soldiers of the cross and all of those who from "goodness of heart" run mad about foreign vice, New Zealand and African darkness, look with christian charity upon these fifty thousand thieves and thirty thousand prostitutes, which infest every portion of our city, and by their presence and their acts, sufficient to clog up the sluices of morality and religion."

My heart feels sad at the above dark, dismal state of morals in our own and other countries. With such a state of society in London, Washington and New York, as I have presented in this and other articles,—only think of such sinks of iniquity within the sound of the church-going bells! Merciful God! what must be the condition of other portions of our globe? We shall speak of that in the next number.

In conclusion I will say, "the wicked are doing wickedly." "Evil men and seducers are waxing worse and worse." Iniquity abounds, and the fats overflow. The shadows of the evening grow darker, and the wicked must soon drink the dregs of the cup of a sin-avenging God.

The Coming Kingdom.

Taking into our account this one great commanding fact, that the Most High ruleth among the nations of the earth, we may survey the past, and see how completely the will and the word of God have been fulfilled; or we may anticipate the future, and tell from his word the things that are yet to be done among the children of men.

More than twenty-five hundred years ago, when the royal line of David was overthrown and carried into captivity in Babylon, this comprehensive testimony was uttered: "Thus saith the Lord God: Remove the diadem, and take off the crown. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it, and it shall be no more, until He come whose right it is; and I will give it to him." Successive revolutions should mark the history and government of the world, till the coming of the great Anointed One of God, of whom the Scripture testifies, and to him the crown and kingdom should be given as his unqualified and unchanging right. Three great facts are specified—the coming of this glorious Being; the assumption of the kingdom by him; and the undeviating process of human revolutions, until this great inauguration should take place. * * * * * *

The first coming of this Great Redeemer was foretold in a particular designation of time, "from the going forth of the command to restore and build Jerusalem," said the angel unto Daniel, "unto Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks." These sixty-nine weeks of years, or four hundred and eighty-three years, have passed by, and the Messiah came, and was cut off, according to the promise. So several designations of time combine together in the same scheme of symbolical prophecy, to designate the period of his second coming, when he will establish his kingdom, and reign in holiness and peace over his people, and in the multitude of his saints. These are designated as periods of days, and they are given as the durations of specific portions of the appointed scheme of Divine providence and purpose. But though these periods are various in length, and have various points of commencement, they have a very remarkable common termination. The wisest of Scriptural expositors, and the almost universal consent of those who study the Lord's testimonies with seriousness and discrimination, have concurred in the time of their fulfillment. These processions of years include the seven times, or twenty-five hundred and twenty years of Israel's chastisement and Gentile supremacy, called by our Lord "the times of the Gentiles;" the twenty-three hundred years of the destruction and pollution of the temple of God; the twelve hundred and sixty years of Papal usurpation, and the appointed revelation of the infidel Antichrist; and the various intermediate smaller events in their course. All these Scriptural periods have a common termination about the year 1868 of the Christian era. And as nearly and as accurately as Daniel, by the study of the Scriptures, determined the close of the captivity in Babylon, and Simeon and other believing Israelites, from Daniel's prophecies, were looking out at the birth of Jesus for the Messiah, who should accomplish redemption in Israel, may we, from the same study and the same source of information, look forward to the Lord's appearing in the glory of his kingdom, and the establishment of his peaceful and abiding reign upon the earth. All the lines of Scripture prophecy converge in the designation of this year 1868 as the appointed period of His coming whose right is the diadem and crown of Israel, so long removed, and to whom, the Lord God declares, this crown and diadem shall be surely given.

If such calculations of these various appointed periods be just, then how near to us is the peaceful, glorious kingdom of the Son of God! In the revelation of that kingdom, and the glories of his reign, all the wonderful promises of Sacred Scripture—of glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, and good-will to men—in all the details of their application, are included. I shall not dwell at large upon these details. They fill up the sacred writings. They embrace the whole hope of the saints. They accomplish the merciful and gracious purposes of God. * * *

And whatever may be the will of God, who keeps the times and seasons in his own power, in prolonging the days, of which we can know nothing, we may, and must still say, that all the lines of prophecy meet in this designated year 1868, as the time of the glorious coming of the Son of man—the manifestation of the Lord Jesus in the glory of his kingdom, according to the testimony of Scripture. * *

And now, at this point, where Scripture prophecy and historical testimony so remarkably converge, and mutually illustrate each other, what is the view we are to take, and the duty to which we are called? It is for this very purpose I have brought the subject before our readers.

1. To take the view of earth which the Lord's word suggests. Till the glorious coming of the Savior, we may anticipate nothing but successive overturnings of men and earthly things. The revolutions we have seen, will be the history of men, till he shall bring his dominion of peace. If the calculations of prophetic fulfillment are accurately made, then are we in the process of that closing series of revolutions, the sorrows of which the Saviour himself so earnestly describes, and of which Daniel says, "At that time there shall be a time of trouble, such as there never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." The great tribulation of the earth is thus commencing, the effects of which shall be, that "many shall be purified, and made white and tried; and they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." There may be occasional peace for particular nations and for short seasons. But the history of men, in the closing period of the times of the Gentiles, is a history of warfare and revolution, until the Savior appears in the power and majesty of his coming. Thus are we to look at the coming state of the world and men, till he appear to take the kingdom for himself. There will be no peace on earth till that dominion shall come, in which the Prince of Peace himself shall give the peace his people seek.

2. Viewing the world of men in the Savior's view, we are to be sure, for ourselves, we are on the Savior's side. During all this coming trouble, his chosen flock will be purified, made white, and tried. There will be the removal of all things which are shaken, that the things which cannot be shaken may remain. The great salvation which he has perfected cannot be shaken. The promises which he gives to his people cannot be shaken. * *

3. If as yet, we have never consciously embraced the hope which he gives, then now is our special season of mercy, our day of salvation. It is for us now to fly with really believing, obedient hearts, to him, as the sinner's only hope. Oh! let us plunge ourselves, with unquestioning faith, in the fountain of his cleansing blood, and trust his word, to wash our sins away as white as snow. The day of grace is still enduring. The day of exclusion is rapidly approaching. Soon the Bridegroom will appear, and they who are ready will enter in with him to the marriage, and the door will be shut. This awakening, startling period is to be the new-creating season for many souls. Many will gather now around his feet. Many who have been careless, will be careless no more. Now is the time—when earthly things are thus to be overturned, and our particular relations to them are to suffer with others—for all to plead with Jesus for a portion with his people, and to make perfectly sure their own calling and election with him. Oh! catch your opportunity, and fly to Jesus as your portion, and live in him forever!

Rest.

When weary, it is natural to seek repose; and it is natural, too, to long for the time when it may be enjoyed. This fact we are taught by daily observation. The man of business, the lawyer, the doctor, the mechanic, the farmer, when over-tasked, desire rest. They are ready to seek some pleasant retreat, where they may bask themselves in calm repose, and partake of whatever is most pleasing and delightful. And many are the plans that men invent for ease and pleasure, and millions upon millions are the dollars that they spend to carry them out; but such enjoyments, though sought with avidity, are earthly, and, though they may be enjoyed for a moment, they are fleeting, and must soon pass away.

While men of the world are seeking ease and pleasure, the christian, too, desires rest. While the rest sought by the one is transitory, that which is sought by the other endures forever. The world are looking for the "good time coming;" the saints are "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God," even our Savior Jesus Christ. While the hope of the world rests upon fiction; the hope of the saint is based upon reality. The hope that dwells within the christian's heart is indeed a "blessed hope." It cheers his heart amid all the trials and temptations of this life, and enables him through the grace of God to overcome them all.

The christian's rest is sure. It is promised in the immutable word of God; and the faithful saint is certain to realize the fact that there remaineth a rest for the people of God; and when that rest is obtained, it will be rest indeed. The child of God will then be free from care and toil. No more shall he be beset by Satan's tempting hand. [No more shall sorrow's tear fall trickling down his cheek. No more shall grief oppress his heart. No more shall sickness prey upon his frame, and no more death invade the circle of his friends. No: none of these things shall come upon him when once he rests in the kingdom of God.

The christian's rest is eternal. Unlike the flitting pleasures of earth, it will endure forever: it will run parallel with eternity itself.

Surely the christian's rest is worth contending for, and the child of God loves to contend for it. He humbly asks for grace that he may be enabled to overcome every besetment, and at last obtain that rest. He has peace now, and he will then have peace forever.

Sinner, you desire this rest. But, in order to obtain it, you must break off from your sins and obey the gospel. You must turn to God. Why not do so NOW?

Ministerial Rascality.

A letter came to me this evening from a distant locality, a place where my tracts have been scattered, an interest awakened, some converted, and finally a minister settled, and all things reported as in a flourishing state. The letter says:—

"Elder Blank came here among us last ——, an entire stranger, and by his ways and manners induced us to think he was a good and faithful servant of the Lord. We had all confidence in him, not hearing any reports. You can imagine how completely I was taken by surprise by your letter concerning him. You advised me to investigate this matter and put a stop to his preaching. . . . I spoke to him about the stories; he denied all the charges, and demanded where I got my information, etc."

The concluding portion of the letter contains the following:—

"These are strange and trying times. The cause of our Master is rather low here; but a few living epistles, read and known of all men. Last fall we were doing well, but through the influence of Eld. Blank, the then happy few are torn and bleeding, and the effects probably will never be remedied. He has driven every thing from him but a few whom he dupes. I would be grateful to you or any one who would give me advice about a matter which troubles some of the brethren," etc., etc.

It is with pain that I refer to this matter of Ministerial rascality again. As to the present case, I know nothing of the facts. I wrote by request of a friend of this man, giving a word of caution, and directing to an authentic source of information. The needful information was not sought; the suspicion was communicated to the person concerned; the whole was denied; and probably something more tangible than hearsay has convinced them of the true state of things ere this. I merely quote these extracts as the basis of a few additional suggestions, for the benefit of such christians as prefer not to learn every thing by experience.

1. You have no right, before God or man, to harbor a drunken, licentious, dishonest, or ungodly miscreant among you as a professed minister of Christ. You have no right to be deceived by him. Keep your eyes open. God, and all men of common sense, will hold you in some degree responsible for the mischief such a man may cause through your influence.

2. Demand of a stranger, who comes among you, an account of himself. If he is a good man, or an able man, some one knows it. If he is honest, he will be glad to have his character proved. Go, or send, where he has lived. Ask christians, or, if need be, worldlings, town officers, or postmasters, what his reputation is. Demand an account from him, and GET IT TOO!! Don't let him dally along, delay, lie, make a party, do his mischief, and then shipwreck everything.

3. When evil reports, from a reliable source, come drifting along, go or send and see what is at the bottom of them. Don't fool yourself with a notion that, may be, folks are prejudiced, or are too hard on a poor man. If it is so, the more reason why you should sift it. Oftener far you will find the half has not been told you. Get the facts. Get them privately and quietly; then, if it ends in smoke, well; but if not, when you move, have proof ready and do your work thoroughly while you are about it.

4. Make up your mind that ninety-nine villains in a hundred will lie. If you charge a man with his sins, and he owns up, you may conclude he is trying to be honest. If he is guilty, you may be sure he will almost always deny it. Never ask a man to criminate himself. Never accuse a man without proof. If a man has trespassed against you, go and tell him his fault; but if he has trespassed against others a thousand miles away, send and get proof, or say nothing. Don't go to him and tell him about it, and so let him deny, and lie, and fight you, unless you are prepared, with the concurrence of others, to say, "Sir, you can preach here no more till these things are cleared up."

I pray God to spare his people from grievous wolves who enter in, not sparing the flock. In haste, H. L. HASTINGS.

For the Crisis.

Maine, East and West.

I was very glad to see by the notes of our much esteemed missionary, Eld. O. R. Fassett, that he had a prosperous tour East, and found an open door; but I observe that a false impression was made upon his mind, of which he speaks, and which will leave a bad impression on many minds uninformed, east, west and abroad, as it greatly misrepresents many good faithful brethren and sisters who are united in the eastern and western parts of Maine. I think it well, and profitable to all, to correct this impression at once, which grows out of a statement made to Bro. Fassett by some one east, that "there has been no intercourse or christian fellowship and co-operation between the brethren on the Penobscot and those on the Kennebec, and in the western part of the State; and that Bro. Fassett had been the first ministering brother in the State who had ventured over the dividing line." Certainly I do not wonder that such a remark should surprise Bro. Fassett, he being a stranger. It took me all aback, as I have some acquaintance in Advent history in Maine. This remark was probably made by one who has lately become interested in our work, or who has a very limited knowledge of the history of the Advent cause in this State. For the benefit of all such, and to relieve the feelings of many who read that statement, it aught to be made known that we in the western part of the State have had as much intercourse and co-operation as distance and duties would admit. It is certain, we have had full fellowship with very many in all the east; have sought intercourse with them, and "co-operation" in the great work to which God has called us in these last days.

As early as 1844, a good delegation of us attended (and unitedly labored in) a campmeeting in Orrington. The same year, several of us attended a conference in Palmyra, another in Exeter. In 1846 we unitedly held a campmeeting, and also a conference in China,—on middle ground. In 1847 we held a conference in China, organized a home mission society, raised funds, sent out a missionary the next year, who took another minister from the Kennebec, and made a long tour on the Penobscot. In 1858, we held another mutual meeting in China, July 4th, and there mutually voted to hold a campmeeting in Lincolnville, 6 miles from Penobscot waters. A large delegation of us went from the west, and paid liberally of our substance to sustain it. I think the same, or the next year, several of us attended a campmeeting in Exeter, all in full fellowship, on our part. In 1850, we attended a conference in Lincolnville, and heartily united with a large number of eastern brethren. In 1851, we, with others, attended a campmeeting in Orrington, unitedly labored with the brethren, visited Bangor, Brewer, Holden and Oldtown, and held, or attended meetings in each place. In 1862, by mutual consultation we held a campmeeting in China. In 1854 there was such disorder and omens of disunion, that several advised the calling of a general meeting of all the Advent ministers of the State, and all other brethren who would come. I wrote every minister whose address I could obtain, regardless of their positions, and asked their counsel about such a meeting. Five responded, heartily, advising the gathering. A universal call was made through the Advent papers. A few came, and they represented the sympathies and fellowship of many others. Five Maine ministers were present. These annual gatherings have continued with increasing numbers and interest to all who have attended them. Their healthful and saving influence was so manifest on the third year, that a unanimous vote was taken to organize an annual State conference; also to advise the brethren in all parts of the State to hold quarterly conferences. Several eastern brethren were with us and heartily united in the work, and brought many encouraging words from others who rejoiced in our progress. These conferences were not the first held in the west. We had been holding large meetings all through, from our beginning. I have before only mentioned those we had attended east. But of all the meetings we ever held, our annual conferences have been the most signally and extensively blessed of God; giving a healthful, uniting, upbuilding influence to all who attended them. In 1857, one of our ministers in the western part of the State labored considerably on the Penobscot and vicinity, and with an eastern minister, appointed a conference in Carmel, in almost the centre of the eastern brethren. Several of us attended and did what we could. In 1859 we, by invitation, held our annual conference in Lincolnville. It was a stormy time just previous, and but few of our western brethren were able to attend. It was the smallest one we ever held. We have always appointed them where brethren first desired them. Besides these meetings, we have been east several times. I have been often solicited to do so, but could not fill half the calls in my own region. This has been the case with all our ministers in this region.

Let none of our brethren east indulge the thought, that we in the west are not ready to fellowship, and co-operate with them in every good work. "The Lord our God is one Lord." The call is one. Our work should be one—leading sinners to Christ, crying, "Behold he cometh," "exhorting one another." So let it be.

The World's Crisis

AND

SECOND ADVENT MESSENGER.

Boston, Wednesday, Dec. 25, 1861.

☞SPECIAL NOTICE.☜

HEREAFTER ALL LETTERS, COMMUNICATIONS, REMITTANCES AND ORDERS FOR THE WORLD'S CRISIS ARE TO BE DIRECTED TO ELDER MILES GRANT, BOSTON, MASS.

H. L. HASTINGS, President C. P. S.

Wayside Incidents.

Tuesday, Dec. 10th, we left Boston for our discussion at Fitchburg with Mr. Jacob Baker, a Universalist preacher. We spent four evenings in discussing the two following questions—two evenings on each:—

1. "Does the Bible teach the final salvation of all mankind?"

2. "Does the Bible teach that any of the human family shall finally cease to exist?"

On the first question Mr. Baker affirmed and we denied; on the second we supported the affirmative and he the negative. The discussion was in the Town Hall, which was estimated to be filled with some six or seven hundred attentive listeners. The discussion awakened considerable interest and has opened the door for future meetings. The people appeared astonished at the amount of plain Scripture which shows most clearly that all the wicked will be destroyed totally and eternally. Notwithstanding the great efforts that were made to pass by many positive texts that teach the final destruction of all the wicked, the fortress of truth stood unharmed, and the attack upon it only served to inspire new confidence in its strength. Ability and tact were displayed on the part of our opponent, which would have been formidable, had he been sustained by the word of God. As it was, we fell sad to see such energies wasted in trying to support a system of error. The foundation of universal salvation never looked so frail to us as during this discussion. Every passage introduced for its support, when carefully examined, seemed to recoil upon the system to demolish it. This of course, must be so, from the fact that the Bible does not prove both the affirmative and negative of a question, when rightly understood. It is all in favor of universal salvation, or all opposed; either all in favor of eternal torment for the wicked, or all against; all in favor of eternal destruction of the finally impenitent, or all opposed. The case is a clear one, if we let the Bible speak for itself, and mean what it says; and if it does not, then, of course, we are all in the dark as to what it does mean.

Mr. Baker admitted that men are not saved in their sins, and some die in sin; but claimed they progressed into holiness in the future existence; but no passage of scripture could be found to favor such an idea.

He also claimed that the fire and brimstone which is to be employed for the destruction of the wicked, is for the purpose of bleaching out their sins.

Saturday, Dec. 14th, we left Fitchburg for Castleton, Vt. When we arrived at Rutland we found a crowd assembled at the depot to take a farewell look of a regiment of cavalry, en route for the seat of war. We are informed that the regiment consisted of eleven hundred men and horses, which were on board of one hundred and forty cars. It was a thrilling sight, as they moved slowly away, leaving weeping wives, children, fathers and mothers. On their way to Troy, one of their number fell from the cars and was killed. When we considered their spirit of sacrifice for their country in leaving all for the battle-field, to lay their bones in the soldier's grave far from home and loved ones, we felt that the self-denial among professing christians, for the cause of Christ, was put to shame and nearly eclipsed by these men of war. How few are willing to sacrifice any thing for Jesus' sake, to spread his holy religion among their fellow beings. How few are left to visit the widow and fatherless "in their affliction." How small the number that keep themselves "unspotted from the world." "Pure religion, and undefiled" is almost extinct. Many have a name to live, who are dead. Heartless professors are abundant, but living christians are rarely met. It is only here and there that we find one who loves to talk of Christ and his coming. Most love the praise of men more than the truth of God. A semi-infidel speaker, if he only have the gift of speech, is followed by the mass of professors, while the plain servant of God, who preaches the simple truths of the Bible, must speak to a humble few, and be passed by with scornful neglect by the multitude of fashionable church members. O how blind are they who see not the signs of the times which are speaking in thunder tones that Jesus soon is coming. They seem to sleep the sounder, as the evidences thicken around us to show that "the end of all things is at hand." If it were not so, we should not feel so sure that the last moments of time are now passing, and that very soon the trump will sound that shall awaken the dead. How sublime the position now occupied by the saints of God!

Sabbath, Dec. 15th. A large audience assembled at the very pleasant chapel in Castleton, and we had interesting meetings. This church is pressing for the prize of life, and waiting for the coming of the Son of man. They have five prayer meetings each week, in different parts of the town, which are scenes of heart-cheering interest. The Lord has done a great and marvelous work for the people in this place, which has caused the enemies of the truth and the cross of Christ to stand aghast at the sight, while their stout opposition has been only a stimulant to urge on the faithful ones, who love the appearing of our dear Savior.

Monday, 16th. We visited Rutland, called on Bro. Batchelor who is spending his strength in faithful labors in the vineyard of the Lord. In the evening we attended the meeting at this chapel, where we met Bro. Himes, who, by the blessing of the Lord, is awaking a good degree of interest. We shall expect to hear good news from these meetings.

Tuesday, 17th. We attended a funeral in Rutland of Sr. Henry's brother, who is sleeping in Jesus, after a protracted illness. How cheering the thought that death can take but a few more victims before its conquerer appears for their rescue. In the evening, we had an interesting meeting at Hydeville, where we found the brethren and sisters strong in the Lord, anxiously waiting the return of the Son of God, with a well-grounded faith that their expectations will soon be realized. Truly ours is a "BLESSED HOPE."—G.

Things for our Peace.

Dear Christian brethren, the things that make for our peace, are far more important than is often thought. It was so to the Jews; it is so to ourselves. Our Lord, weeping over Jerusalem, said, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now are they hid from thine eyes."—Luke 19: 42. The things specially contemplated in this passage, were the indifference felt and manifested with reference to the coming and work of the Messiah. And thus it may be, even with ourselves, when the Messiah comes again, and doubtless will be, with many professing godliness.

But after duly considering the specific application of this passage, we do well to notice that there are two points as clearly brought out, as is the fact that the Jews were criminally indifferent to the Lord's advent: First, that peace—peace in its broadest and largest sense—in our own conscience, with God, and if possible with all men, is absolutely necessary to our spiritual well-being; and secondly, that we do well to consider and know the things which belong unto our peace. The criterion thus furnished by our Lord, was one that no verbosity in discourse, or ingenuity in ethics, can possibly invalidate. To such consciences as have and maintain "peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ,"—"peace like a river," there must be such an humble and hearty reception of the Word of God, and exhibition of christian disposition, as shall really be "without fault and blameless." In this we do not mean to say there can be no errors of judgment; but that there can be no culpable wrong. That all such persons must and do rejoice in the fact of Christ's second advent we have no doubt. Indeed we believe that it is impossible to maintain that frame of mind wherein we have peace with God, and not rejoice in witnessing the appearing and kingdom of his Son.

In the same manner we believe that any known neglect of duty, in matters however small—moral dereliction of whatever nature, or unbelief of God's word, is surely and necessarily fatal to the possession of peace with God. And if not found in possession of this priceless boon at the time of the second advent, or in the day of judgment, we are lost.

How well then it behooves us to look to our own lives, our social relations, our thoughts, our words, and our acts; and to see to it that in all things we offend not! Indeed we hesitate not to say, there is no relation we can possibly persist in maintaining—whether social, ecclesiastical, or political—where our peace with God is hindered, without the guilt of suicide. Placed in whatever circumstances we may be, we must have peace. "Better is a dry morsel, and quietness therewith, than an house full of sacrifices with strife." But while in a world where are men who do not and will not obey the truth, but are contentious (Rom. 2: 8), presumptuous and self-willed (2 Pet. 2: 10), let us not forget that "In the world ye shall have tribulation." Yet it is written, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you" (John 14: 27). "To be spiritually minded, is life and peace" (Rom. 8: 6). Let us follow the things that make [illegible] peace" (ib. 14: 19). "God hath called us to peace" (1 Cor. 7: 15). "Now the Lord of peace himself give you peace always by all means" (2 Thess. 3: 16).—M.

"Writing for the Paper."

To say just what one wishes to say, at the time, and in the manner in which it should be said, is that happy art which, alas! few persons have ever achieved,—at least if we may judge from what we see and hear and experience. But at the same time, what satisfaction is there in spending a long time, and using many words, when a few minutes, and a few words, would effect the end sought much better? This we are prompted to ask after reading over four closely written pages to simply ascertain that a good brother wishes us to credit him with the enclosed dollar and continue his paper. If you have business you wish transacted, put the word "Business" on a small piece of paper, and say just what you wish. And if you wish to cheer us with an epistle containing good tidings, then write an epistle; but mind and separate it from the business note, so we need not be perplexed with it in the business department. And then, you will do well for your own sake as well as for those you would benefit, to study brevity, making every sentence pregnant with thought, and, if possible, compact as a cannon ball.—M.

The News Significant.

For several years past the students of prophecy have been sanguine in the belief that, according to all prophetic declarations, we must shortly witness such national perplexity, commotions, and revolutions, as the world never saw. For a number of years this preaching had little to confirm it in the estimation of the public, except such reasonable arguments as could be adduced from the Scriptures, but which few had an ear to hear. But to-day, how immense the burden of evidence in proof that these things are so!—that the last scene in the present dispensational drama is about to be witnessed! How intently men watch for the news! From how many thousands, and millions, are echoed every day, and in every successive hour of the day, the inquiry, "What's the news?" Men had promised themselves peace, but lo! the prospect of war increases in every direction. War with England is threatened; a foreign fleet is about making its way to Mexico; legions of British soldiers are pouring into Canada; and forgetful of similar perplexities that threaten the world, how increasingly dubious is the fast gathering cloud that hangs over our own nation. But look abroad, and lo! all is dark. It is the portentous storm-cloud hanging low over all lands. Never did the daily papers have such demands laid upon them as to-day. All men are on tip-toe of excitement; and steam engines or lightning telegraphs but slowly respond to the more impetuous tide of human feelings that rush on in the awful whirlpool toward the dark centre, that all hearts feel is but a little way ahead.

O, with what fearfulness are men beginning to look after those things that are coming upon the earth! Who, familiar with the prophecies, can forbear to seriously question whether we are, if not already hearing, at least speedily to hear, the echoes of the last—the seventh, symbolical trumpet? The nations are angry, and soon the wrath of God will overtake them. Let us then not forget to wait for the news that shall then be telegraphed us from the skies—"Behold He cometh!"—M.

War with England.

It is believed that with all the bluster of newspaperdom, England and the United States will be exceedingly slow in coming to the conclusion that they will settle their difficulties by shedding each other's blood. If we may believe the accounts brought to our ears, the news, so exciting to the public at large, was received with great coolness at Washington. A good deal of loud talk on the part of English writers seems to have been expected. And that they contemplate thereby accelerating events in our present war with the rebels, is very probable. By this means, a more speedy supply of cotton for their mills might be obtained, which, considered in connection with the starving condition of their millions of operatives now without work, becomes of itself a grand desideratum.

It is argued that the end which England seeks, could not be otherwise than postponed a long ways, by a war between the two countries. Again, it is possible in such an event that the far-seeing Emperor of France may effectually interpose between the two countries. But for ourselves, we should not be surprised if, in a much shorter time than is now thought of, all our most dreadful fears were realized in a war between the two countries.—M.

The following we call "a sign of the times." Who could have dreamed such a fact a few years ago!—M.

MOUNTED MINISTERS.—The New Orleans Delta, of recent date, mentions a visit from three distinguished and learned divines of the Methodist denomination, wearing uniforms, and accoutered for the cavalry—mind, not Calvary—service. It appears that these reverend gentlemen, one of whom is President of the Methodist University of Texas, are commissioned by J. D. to raise a mounted regiment of preachers for the Confederate army.

The Rising Storm.

Notwithstanding the awful state of things in the world at the present time, a worse one is evidently approaching. Each succeeding wave rises higher, and those heaving in sight look more terrible. But amid all the distress and perplexity, the christian stands securely on the Rock of ages, fearing no harm, for Jesus, his best friend, directs the storm; and the confiding saint knows that all this terrible upheaving and overturning of the wicked nations, with their final everlasting destruction is for the benefit of those who trust in the Lord, who are to "take the kingdom . . . under the whole heaven," and possess it "for ever and ever."

A leading Journal of New York., when speaking of our relations with England remarks:—

"It becomes the duty of the United States to prepare without delay for hostilities with England, and also with as many other European nations as may judge this to be a good opportunity for overthrowing the only democratic government in the world. Not a day should be lost in preparing to cover the seas with a fleet of well armed privateers, armed with rifled cannon. In the course of two or three months several hundred first class privateers may be equipped and sent to sea, long before any foreign fleet could blockade our ports. To accomplish this end, the whole manufacturing resources of the country should be devoted excusively to the production of rifled cannon and other materials of war. Meanwhile, every shipyard in the country should be required to double its force of workmen, and set to work to build steamers of war for the general government. With proper energy we can add one hundred well built steam men-of-war, including twenty iron-clad vessels, to our present navy by the spring; and it will be spring at least before England can make any demonstration of any magnitude."

It is evident to all close observers of the signs of the times that a terrible war storm is coming; but the christian has nothing to fear. In these terrible convulsions he sees the sure tokens that the Prince of Peace is at the doors, and soon we shall see his glorious face.—G.

What the Spirits Say.

In the testimony of a spirit given in the Banner of Light, Nov. 23d, 1861, it is said:—

"Many times before we have said that we cannot place implicit confidence in that which we find between the lids of the Bible. . . . The Bible tells you many foolish things, based upon ignorance and superstition, that no sensible, reasoning human being for an instant should entertain."

A spirit claiming to be Ann McGraw when speaking of her condition in the "spirit-world," says:—

"My condition here at first was a very wretched one. I felt sad for some time, and I found my sudden death a great curse to me. I tell you what it is—all who get shoved out of their tenements here before their time to go, cannot find a tenement ready for them on the other side."

[A visitor: "Is this the case with those who die in a good cause?"]

"It is the case, no matter how good the cause is. Nature don't turn out of her way for causes."

Another spirit, when speaking of sin, says:—

"Spiritually and divinely considered, there is no sin. Full well we know the book you call the Bible teaches of sin. Full well we know the whole christian world recognizes such a condition, but, to us, there is no sin."

Another says:—

"All men and women are equally righteous, because all are good. No matter where we find them, or under whatever condition they exist, they are good."—G.

Sacrifice.

There is a great want of sacrifice in these days, even among those who profess to be looking for the return of Christ within a brief period. The fact is a lamentable one, and shows a low state of christianity. But this is not the case with all. There are many noble exceptions. The following from a brother in Philadelphia is a specimen:—

"DEAR BRO. GRANT:—I have read in the Crisis a call for money to make a tract fund. I have long wished to do something more than I have heretofore done for the cause of truth; but could not find the money to spare. I have been trying to sell a house at a great sacrifice, but thus far I have not been able to dispose of it. O that the good Lord would send some one to take it that his suffering saints might have a portion of it, has been my prayer. As I have not yet been able to sell it, I have concluded to make a small sacrifice, by sending to you a gold chain, I have been wearing for some time. It cost twenty dollars, but I can do without it; and I wish you to dispose of it and add the proceeds to the tract fund; and may it be the means of conveying the glorious light of life to some poor, benighted soul that will give glory to God throughout the countless ages of eternity."

May the Lord bless our dear brother, and may others be led by his noble example to make some new sacrifice for the good of their fellow men; remembering the Lord has said, "Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice." Who is ready for for the work? If we ever do any thing, now is the time. There is no way, probably, by which so much good can be done by so small means, as by the circulation of tracts. People are anxious to read, and those who are preaching the word feel a great need of a few to give away judiciously, in each field of labor. These little silent messengers preach while the minister is absent. Come, brethren, let us make a grand effort to scatter them far and wide. A few dollars thus employed may accomplish an incalculable amount of good. Let us sow liberally, that we may reap bountifully. The Lord "loveth a cheerful giver."

Novel Reading.

The reading of novels has become a great evil. By means of these the minds of our youth are early filled with seeds of corruption, that afterwards produce very bad results, leading thousands away from virtue's path, and destroying their love for the truths of the Bible. Novel readers usually become dissatisfied with mankind, nothing suits them, because things do not come up to their fanciful ideal; they live and soar in imaginary fantasies till they scorn association with the humble walks of life, and turn in disgust from all but the imaginary. When people resort to novel reading, we may be sure they are losing their love for the truth and are departing from the Lord.

In an able article, by Dr. Edward Lawton, on the "causes of decline in public morals," he says:—

"Novel reading must be admitted to have great influence in fashioning and modeling the mind of the rising generation. From this folly our ancestors were almost, if not altogether free. We regret to think that novelistic literature is fast supplanting our taste for scientific knowledge and religious speculation, and that the present age is slowly but certainly exchanging the useful, permanent and profound, for the imaginative, the licentious and fashionable. . . . let fools, and those who never intend to do anything for themselves or their country, read trash. The novel reader lives in a land of fiction; there is nothing real or substantial about him; he has no pleasure in the study or pursuit of truth or any science, and no joy in the ordinary occupations of every-day life, which constitute half the happiness of every well-balanced mind. 'It requires great fortitude,' says the learned Hevelius, 'quietly to remain ignorant of those frivolous accomplishments which are valued by the multitude; but it is absolutely necessary for one who values truth, or aspires to the establishment of a permanent reputation.'"

The London "Spectator" asks Rev. Dr. Cumming why he has taken a fresh lease of his dwelling house, if, according to his prediction, the world is coming to an end in 1867.

Query: Did the "Spectator" think Dr. Cumming could live without a dwelling house for the next six years, or did it desire to give utterance to the feelings with which a God-hating world looks upon the subject of the Lord's coming?—M.

THE MODEL CHURCH.—"Mr. Hastings, in his interesting volume, traces first the condition and character of the seven churches of Asia, and, afterward, the unmeasurable superiority of the model church over all the others. Zeal, earnestness and enthusiasm characterized the church at Thessalonica, whose work, as Paul himself said, was one of love, and faith, and patience, an example to the other churches and to all in Macedonia and Achaia. Modern christians will prize this intelligent account of the early triumph of the gospel."—(Wilmington) Delaware Inquirer.

Publication of "The Coming Struggle."—A Call for Aid.

At the earnest solicitation of several brethren, I have resolved by the blessing of God and the aid of friends, to have "The Coming Struggle" published in pamphlet form. I have written to Bro. Hastings, who assures me that he will superintend its publication when the money shall be advanced. Judging from his statement of the cost of publishing his "Reasons for my Hope," I conclude that $150 will be required to stereotype and publish one thousand copies in similar type and style.

Now, brethren, I have no doubt but the work will be published, but only through your aid. As I have spent most of my time during the last year in preaching a "free" gospel. I have no means at command myself; but I am willing to give the time spent in preparing the article—about six weeks—with several days' more necessary attention to the work, besides some pecuniary outlay, as my share towards getting out the first thousand, without any return. Who else will do as much and receive the pamphlets at cost in return? Or, if you cannot do as much, will you cast in a mite, and send it to the Crisis, where the Editors, I trust, will acknowledge the weekly remittances, from whom Bro. Hastings will receive the same. Thus the first thousand will go only to subscribers; hence, all who wish for the pamphlet within the next year, perhaps, will find it necessary to subscribe to this fund. I design to do the same.

Going to Conference in the West.

Going to conference in the east, where there is money enough to pay fare, and cars enough to ride in, is one thing; but going to conference in the new part of the west, where we ride one hundred and fifty miles in a wagon, and sleep in the woods at night, is quite another thing. A gospel pioneer's life is hard, yet it has some novel phases. Wish I could picture it out to some of our eastern friends, who fancy they have hard fare.

As we ride along, night approaches; it is time to put up: "whoa, ponies."—"Guess we had better camp here,—plenty of water and wood." "Bro. Sheldon, we'll take care of the horses if you'll build a fire." Fire is built; the preachers draw around it, eat their supper, talk upon religion till bed-time, or rather till time to roll up in a blanket and take a sleep on the ground; then the request is made, "let us pray." After prayer, the preachers may be seen soundly asleep in the woods, on the ground. Frequently an impudent owl would inquire, "Who, who be you?" But as as we have more important business on hand than conversing with owls, we leave such questions unanswered. Night after night brings a repetition of the same thing. Yet I hear no complaint of hardship among our pioneers of the west. Such is going to conferences in the west. Hope more will try it next fall. W. Sheldon.

Rumors of War.

Bro. Grant:—The news this morning seems to be indeed warlike in respect to England and the United States; and if the time has come when the prophecy is to be fulfilled, that "evil shall go forth from nation to nation," we may not be surprised to see some foreign nation at war with us; and we who have been looking into the prophecies for years past, will not be in darkness as to its final issue.

But what is our duty at this time as believers in the speedy coming of the Just One? Are we doing all in our power to warn the world of its approaching doom? It is to be feared that many are so absorbed in propagating and defending some favorite theory or doctrine, that the salvation of sinners is too much overlooked. The Lord arouse the church to gather in the harvest.

Correspondence.

From the West.

Bro. Grant:—I send you this epistle from the West. I came here by invitation of a brother pilgrim, whom I have found to be a good man and an earnest advocate of truth. My trip was attended with engines giving out and breaking down, failures of making connections, &c. On the way here, I stopped over the Sabbath at Marion, Ohio, where I found several believers in "Bible truth." If I had not engaged to come direct, I should have remained a few days and held several meetings, as they strongly urged me to do. You may look for a subscriber or two from there, as they promised to take the Crisis. I hope some of the brethren who may be traveling that way will stop and see them. They will be well received.

I have found an excellent field of labor here; many places where the sentiments we hold have never been heard. I expect to meet with much opposition from sectarians. I am ready to meet it! I feel in earnest, and I am determined to "war a good warfare." I endeavored to speak on last Sunday afternoon in this place. A Methodist spoke in the morning, and a preacher of the United Brethren in the evening. The latter made a desperate attempt to refute my argument, but he most signally failed. He became confused, and remarked that he was no preacher and could not preach, and begged some one to close the meeting for him. I hope to plant a few "penitent believers" by baptism in the likeness of Christ's death, on next Lord's day. And oh! what an amount of grace I shall need! what a baptism of the Spirit I shall want in order to accomplish successfully the great work before me! Pray for me, that utterance may be given me, and that I may speak as becometh the Oracles of God. * * * *

I congratulate you sincerely on your return to your former work; and may God grant you the largest success, and a very large list of good paying subscribers. You [illegible] me in relation to the latter [illegible] brethren and sisters. If [illegible] pamphlets lying [illegible] please send [illegible] good use for [illegible] your [illegible] gentle and [illegible] independent and [illegible] address is Loudon [illegible] T. W. Smith.

[illegible] Mansfield.

[illegible] our brethren [illegible], and what [illegible] would say a [illegible] Crisis. We [illegible] brethren in [illegible] of the [illegible] and Knox [illegible] have had but little [illegible] in all this trip, as it has taken about all of our time between appointments to travel from one place to another. In all of these places we have enjoyed excellent meetings with our brethren. Our congregations were generally large, quiet, and attentive. Our brethren generally in this region have but little to do with the present war spirit. The general impression is, that the end declared from the beginning is fast approaching; and now is the time to watch and pray, lest we fall into temptation.

Two houses of worship were locked up against us,—one in Brown, the other in Hancock county. The result is, the foundation for a new house is now laid, in each of these places, for a building 36 by 50 each, and we trust will be ready for dedication in the Spring. This is as it should be. Our brethren in Warren county need a house very much. We hope they will make an effort to put one under way this winter. There are many places in this region where our brethren are destitute of a place of worship. We earnestly beseech our brethren, where they are able, to build some place of worship, that the cause may prosper in your hands.

We have now commenced protracted meetings in this place. We have held two evenings already; the prospect for a good meeting is quite flattering. Our health is good; never was better, —never felt more like working in God's field than at the present. Our calls to go in different sections are many. Brethren, be patient, and we will come around as soon as possible. We could locate three or four good preachers, if they were here, where they could live and do good. Will Brn. Berick and W. Pratt look up some good soldiers for the west. Say you do, and come with them. We have plenty of room for you. We need help. May the Lord send forth more laborers, is our prayer. Amen.

Buchanan, Mich., Dec. 9th, 1861.

Extracts from Letters.

Bro. S. Woodruff, of Lovely St., Ct., writes:—"Dear Brn. and Srs.:—Believing we are in the end of time and near the judgment, I desire to be engaged in the great work of exhorting my brethren to steadfastness in Christ, and in turning others from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto the living God, who giveth life and immortality to all that come to him through the gospel of his dear Son, who now sitteth at the right hand of the Father, interceding for dying men. When I take these things into consideration, I can truly say—

'Amazing grace! how sweet the sound,
That saved a wretch like me.'

If 'the husbandman hath long patience' to wait 'for the precious fruit of the earth,' should not we, brethren, have patience? yea, have long patience to wait for him, and love his appearing?

The coming of the Son of man is a theme I love; and oh, my brethren, be steadfast in the Lord; let your trust be in him, who spake as never man spake; he who has said, 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.' He will be our stay, and staff, and guide us safely through this wilderness of woe, and, by his grace assisting us, dear brethren, we can enter the kingdom. By watching, be praying, 'lest coming suddenly, he find you sleeping'; lest some evil, "springing up, trouble you, and thereby many be defiled.'

Are there any that have lost their first love? Let me say to such, return from your heart wanderings and seek the Lord. Hearken unto his commandments, that your peace be 'like a river,' and your 'righteousness as the waves of the sea.' What will the poor sinner do in that day, when God shall judge the world in righteousness, and his people with his truth? Sinner, oh sinner, flee, flee into the arms of mercy. Jesus invites you, the angels welcome you, 'the Spirit and the Bride say come, . . . and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely'—free salvation; come one, come all."

Bro. S. S. Gibbs, of Bunker Hill, Ill., writes:—"Bro. and Sr. N. W. Henry visited us awhile since, and we had a glorious meeting together. Have found some inconvenience in not taking both the Crisis and the Harbinger, as in taking only the latter I have been misinformed of where my brethren were. Bro. W. Pratt labored in an adjoining county for some time, of which I had no knowledge until he returned east. We now have the labors of Eld.'s L. Lewis and J. C. Bywater at times. But we expect soon to see the Lord, and meet to part no more. O glorious thought!"

Obituary Notices.

Ann Mary T., daughter of John and Hannah E. Shannon, of Portsmouth, N. H., died Nov. 16th, aged four years and eleven months.

The subject of this notice was a lovely child, beloved by all who knew her, the idol of the family. She was suddenly torn from the bosom of parents. Not only was this blow unexpected, but heavy—almost too much for frail mortality—one of those shocks that will all surrounding objects in mourning. Hence the inquiry, is there no healing balm, no consolation, no bright side to death, no light sufficient to dispel the darkness of this gloomy vale? Is it possible that our heavenly Father has passed by this dark place in earth, which has caused so much weeping, sorrowing, and fearful forebodings? Ah! never. Christ our Lord has walked through this impenetrable darkness, and left an ever burning, brilliant lamp to cheer the pilgrim. The friends will find much consolation in the following beautiful lines, composed by a Sister for this occasion:—

One we fondly cherished sleepeth,
Rudely from our bosom torn;
Now the grave our treasure keepeth
Till the resurrection morn.

Hushed are now her tones of gladness,
Pallid her once beaming brow;
Shrouded is our home in sadness,
And our tears in sorrow flow.

Cheering is the promise given,
"Thy loved ones shall live again;"
And the tomb shall soon be riven
Where her lovely form has lain.

With what gladness we'll behold her,
Waking in immortal bloom;
In our arms once more enfold her,
In our bright, eternal home. W. P.

Scalded to death, Dec. 4th, 1861, Mary J., daughter of Daniel and Isabella Fowler of Bancroft, (Middlefield Switch) Mass., aged fifteen years.

She went to her work in the morning as usual, and about two o'clock she accidentally fell into a vat of boiling water, used for bleaching, boiled by twenty-five pounds of steam, and though scalded in a frightful manner, she lived twelve hours, had her senses, and told her mother she would tell them how it happened when she got well. She did not complain. Young Mary was a good girl, and would often welcome the way-worn pilgrim to her father's house, (her parents are Adventists.) Her father, with too many others, has been on the back ground, and Mary was deeply interested in his spiritual welfare; and I pray this dreadful providence may awake in them a deeper interest than ever before, and I hope the children will follow her example in prayer and good living, and meet her on the other shore.

The writer improved the solemn occasion before a large and deeply feeling audience, from 1 Thess. 4: 13, 14. Bro. and Sr. Fowler, I expect to greet your dear Mary in the morning of the resurrection. Will you meet us there? Will the children meet us there, where no tears, no sighs, no groans are uttered, but all is fair?

When Mary fell into the fatal tub, she was singing joyfully—

"You pray for me, and I'll pray for you,
And that is the way we christians do."

The Emperor will probably send two frigates to reinforce the French fleet in the American waters.

ITALY.

The debate on the Roman question was resumed to-day. Signor Buoncompagni argued that it was still necessary to act with France and Italy. He said he would go to Venice when she had 300,000 men, and then Rome might be obtained.

PRUSSIA.

The election of members for the Chamber of Deputies took place on the 6th throughout the kingdom, with results in favor of the liberal party.

The cholera was still raging in Cabool, though not so violently. Victims of the disease were said to number fifty daily.

Gen Scott is a passenger in the Arago. His health is much improved.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the steamship Persia, we have news from Liverpool to the 15th inst.

Prince Albert expired at noon on Sunday 15th inst., of gastric fever.

The Persia, with 1100 troops on board, is bound for the River du Loupe or Bic.

It has been suggested to shipowners to instruct captains of outward bound vessels to signalize any English vessels that war with America is probable. This suggestion is strongly approved by underwriters.

The Australasian sailed from Liverpool on the 13th with troops for Canada.

The 1st division, 10th brigade garrison artillery embarked in the Niagara for Halifax.

It is understood that ten companies of engineers are to be sent to British America.

Austrian advices from Vienna 10th state that during the Emperor's stay at Venice he liberated all the political prisoners.

London, Dec. 12. The Journal de Havre, the Seramphore of Marseilles and the Gironde of Bordeaux, advise the French Government to preserve a strict neutrality in the case of a war between England and America.

The Momento of Turin warns England against bringing on a war with America, as France would take advantage of it to interfere in the East.

Austrian papers state that fears are entertained at Vienna that war between England and America would remove the only obstacle in Europe against French ambition, and that France would begin war against Germany.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

New York, Dec. [illegible] The Herald editorially says, according to [illegible] latest advices from Washington, all apprehensions of a rupture with England upon the late affair of the Trent may be dismissed. Our Cabinet, we are informed, are looking to the absorbing and paramount issue of the suppression of this Southern rebellion. They will yield to the present demand of England, as the conditions of her neutrality, even if these demands involve the restoration of Mason and Slidell to the protection of the British flag and a disavowal of or apology for their seizure by Capt. Wilkes.

New York, Dec. [illegible] The Tribune learns that among the papers transmitted to the Senate, Thursday, concerning Mexican affairs, was a project of a treaty with Mexico, the provisions of which are of such importance that it is thought it would, if confirmed, lead to a withdrawal of England and France from the Spanish alliance.

It provides that our Government shall pay $11,000,000 to Mexico, to be applied to the satisfaction of English and French creditors, and for a grant to the United States of commercial privileges, and for the adjustment of our outstanding debts and right of transit across Mexican territory for troops and munitions of war. It is thought that the treaty will be speedily confirmed and sent at once to Vera Cruz.

It is asserted that the fire at Charleston was set by some members of an Irish regiment which had mutinied in consequence of the harsh treatment of Col. Corcoran.

The Toronto Leader says a hundred thousand volunteers will be in arms in Canada before the dawn of spring, and that twenty-five thousand regulars will be ready to support them.

The Victories. Last week went out very well. Gen. Pope's successes in Western Missouri give assurance that he will soon clear his section of the rebel hordes, and pay his way as he goes. In two days he bags 1600 rebels, nearly a thousand horses, sixty wagons heavily loaded with valuable supplies, with a quantity of tents, baggage, &c. He was within a few days' march of Price's army, and will undoubtedly defeat it if he can catch it. Gen. Pope is the officer who has so successfully administered affairs in Northern Missouri during the summer.

The operations of Gen. McCall on Friday, though not of the first magnitude, were admirable in quality and result. It was about the first time in that quarter that a serious collision with the enemy has given us an easy and decisive victory. The forces were about equal, and after a fight of an hour and a half, the fierce South Carolinians, Alabamians &c., were completely routed, leaving behind them sixty killed and nineteen wounded, and more equipments and clothing than our troops could bring away. This affair will have an excellent effect. Gen. Ord was the officer immediately in command.—Boston Journal.

The English, French and American Navies.—A short time since the official statistics of the English navy gave 84,000 sailors, 356 captains, and 1700 lieutenants, while the French returns enumerated 30,000 sailors and 257 captains. The number of guns in the British navy is not far from 12,000. England has 432 steam vessels of war, including 53 ships of the line, 40 frigates, 98 sloops, and 189 gunboats. She has also attached to her navy 128 sailing vessels, including 10 ships of the line and 17 frigates, besides 54 sailing vessels now building, making a grand total of 614 steaming and sailing vessels now effective. There are about 100 more which could be fitted up in a short time.

France has 285 steam and 180 sailing vessels—total 445, including 40 ships of the line and 61 frigates. The number of guns in the French navy is 8122.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his report just transmitted to Congress, states that we have 264 vessels, 2557 guns, and 22,000 seamen, but he includes in his list receiving ships and ships of the line that have been on the stocks since 1818. The following table gives such war vessels as are afloat or are in course of advancing preparation for service, nor does it include the storeships and transports of the regular navy or those chartered by the government for the emergencies of the war. Steam vessels 131, with 1051 guns; sailing vessels 82, with 837 guns, total 26 vessels and 1832 guns.

To Bro. John T. Ongley.

Dear Brother,—As you are often laboring in Ohio, could you not make it convenient to go to Marion, Marion Co., and call on Bro. [illegible] Camp, and appoint a meeting? There are a few believers in the truths we advocate, and a number searching for the truth. They want to hear our sentiments. They have written to me to come, but I cannot do so now. I found them while on my way here. You would have no difficulty in organizing a church there. They will aid all they can in defraying your expenses. I feel interested in them, and I hope you or some other of our able brethren will go that way.

Your Bro., T. W. Smith, Evangelist.

Advent Conference and Lectures.

I shall hold an Advent conference and give lectures on the speedy coming of Christ, in Richford, Vt., to commence Dec. 29th, 1861, and continue about ten days. Brethren in the ministry, and brethren and sisters generally, are cordially invited to attend and participate in the meetings of the conference. This will be one of a series of such meetings, to arouse the church and world to the great and solemn fact of the speedy return of our King to reign on Mount Zion. Let us have a grand rally, as in former days. Elder S. S. Garvin will make arrangements. Friends, on arrival, will call on him for directions.

of the horses if you'll build a fire." Fire is built; the preachers draw around it, eat their supper, talk upon religion till bed-time, or rather till time to roll up in a blanket and take a sleep on the ground; then the request is made, "let us pray." After prayer, the preachers may be seen soundly asleep in the woods, on the ground. Frequently an impudent owl would inquire, "Who, who be you?" But as as we have more important business on hand than conversing with owls, we leave such questions unanswered. Night after night brings a repetition of the same thing. Yet I hear no complaint of hardship among our pioneers of the west. Such is going to conference in the west. Hope more will try it next fall.

For the Crisis.

Rumors of War.

Bro. Grant:—The news this morning seems to be indeed warlike in respect to England and the United States; and if the time has come when the prophecy is to be fulfilled, that "evil shall go forth from nation to nation," we may not be surprised to see some foreign nation at war with us; and we who have been looking into the prophecies for years past, will not be in darkness as to its final issue.

But what is our duty at this time as believers in the speedy coming of the Just One? Are we doing all in our power to warn the world of its approaching doom? It is to be feared that many are so absorbed in propagating and defending some favorite theory or doctrine, that the salvation of sinners is too much overlooked. The Lord arouse the church to gather in the harvest.

Boston, Dec. 16. D. N. Smith.

Correspondence.

From the West.

Bro. Grant:—I send you this epistle from the West. I came here by invitation of a brother pilgrim, whom I have found to be a good man and an earnest advocate of truth. My trip was attended with engines giving out and breaking down, failures of making connections, &c. On the way here, I stopped over the Sabbath at Marion, Ohio, where I found several believers in "Bible truth." If I had not engaged to come direct, I should have remained a few days and held several meetings, as they strongly urged me to do. You may look for a subscriber or two from there, as they promised to take the Crisis. I hope some of the brethren who may be traveling that way will stop and see them. They will be well received.

I have found an excellent field of labor here; many places where the sentiments we hold have never been heard. I expect to meet with much opposition from sectarians. I am ready to meet it! I feel in earnest, and I am determined to "war a good warfare." I endeavored to speak on last Sunday afternoon in this place. A Methodist spoke in the morning, and a preacher of the United Brethren in the evening. The latter made a desperate attempt to refute my arguments, but he most signally failed. He became confused, and remarked that he was no preacher and could not preach, and begged some one to close the meeting for him. I hope to plant a few "penitent believers" by baptism in the likeness of Christ's death, on next Lord's day. And oh! what an amount of grace I shall need! what a baptism of the Spirit I shall want in order to accomplish successfully the great work before me! Pray for me, that utterance may be given me, and that I may speak as becometh the Oracles of God. * * * *

I congratulate you sincerely on your return to your former work; and may God grant you the largest success, and a very large list of good paying subscribers. You [illegible] me in relation to the latter [illegible] brethren and sisters. If [illegible] or pamphlets lying [illegible], please send [illegible] good use for [illegible] your [illegible] gentle and [illegible] independent and [illegible] address is London

T. W. Smith.

[illegible] Mansfield. [illegible] our brethren [illegible], and what [illegible] would say a [illegible] the Crisis. We [illegible] brethren in [illegible] of the [illegible] and Knox [illegible] have had but little [illegible] in all this trip, as it has taken about all of our time between appointments to travel from one place to another. In all of these places we have enjoyed excellent meetings with our brethren. Our congregations were generally large, quiet, and attentive. Our brethren generally in this region have but little to do with the present war spirit. The general impression is, that the end declared from the beginning is fast approaching; and now is the time to watch and pray, lest we fall into temptation.

Two houses of worship were locked up against us,—one in Brown, the other in Hancock county. The result is, the foundation for a new house is now laid, in each of these places, for a building 36 by 50 each, and we trust will be ready for dedication in the Spring. This is as it should be. Our brethren in Warren county need a house very much. We hope they will make an effort to put one under way this winter. There are many places in this region where our brethren are destitute of a place of worship. We earnestly beseech our brethren, where they are able, to build some place of worship, that the cause may prosper in your hands.

We have now commenced protracted meetings in this place. We have held two evenings already; the prospect for a good meeting is quite flattering. Our health is good; never was better, —never felt more like working in God's field than at the present. Our calls to go in different sections are many. Brethren, be patient, and we will come around as soon as possible. We could locate three or four good preachers, if they were here, where they could live and do good. Will Brn. Berick and W. Pratt look up some good soldiers for the west. Say you do, and come with them. We have plenty of room for you. We need help. May the Lord send forth more laborers, is our prayer. Amen.

Buchanan, Mich., Dec. 9th, 1861.

Extracts from Letters.

Bro. S. Woodruff, of Lovely St., Ct., writes:—"Dear Brn. and Srs.:—Believing we are in the end of time and near the judgment, I desire to be engaged in the great work of exhorting my brethren to steadfastness in Christ, and in turning others from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto the living God, who giveth life and immortality to all that come to him through the gospel of his dear Son, who now sitteth at the right hand of the Father, interceding for dying men. When I take these things into consideration, I can truly say—

'Amazing grace! how sweet the sound,
That saved a wretch like me.'

If 'the husbandman hath long patience' to wait 'for the precious fruit of the earth,' should not we, brethren, have patience? yea, have long patience to wait for him, and love his appearing?

The coming of the Son of man is a theme I love; and oh, my brethren, be steadfast in the Lord; let your trust be in him, who spake as never man spake; he who has said, 'I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.' He will be our stay, and staff, and guide us safely through this wilderness of woe, and, by his grace assisting us, dear brethren, we can enter the kingdom. By watching, be praying, 'lest coming suddenly, he find you sleeping'; lest some evil, 'springing up, trouble you, and thereby many be defiled.'

Are there any that have lost their first love? Let me say to such, return from your heart wanderings and seek the Lord. Hearken unto his commandments, that your peace be 'like a river,' and your 'righteousness as the waves of the sea.' What will the poor sinner do in that day, when God shall judge the world in righteousness, and his people with his truth? Sinner, oh sinner, flee, flee into the arms of mercy. Jesus invites you, the angels welcome you, 'the Spirit and the Bride say come, . . . and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely'—free salvation; come one, come all."

Bro. S. S. Gibbs, of Bunker Hill, Ill., writes:—"Bro. and Sr. N. W. Henry visited us awhile since, and we had a glorious meeting together. Have found some inconvenience in not taking both the Crisis and the Harbinger, as in taking only the latter I have been misinformed of where my brethren were. Bro. W. Pratt labored in an adjoining county for some time, of which I had no knowledge until he returned east. We now have the labors of Eld.'s I. Lewis and J. C. Bywater at times. But we expect soon to see the Lord, and meet to part no more. O glorious thought!"

Obituary Notices.

Ann Mary T., daughter of John and Hannah E. Shannon, of Portsmouth, N. H., died Nov. 16th, aged four years and eleven months.

The subject of this notice was a lovely child, beloved by all who knew her, the idol of the family. She was suddenly torn from the bosom of parents. Not only was this blow unexpected, but heavy—almost too much for frail mortality—one of those shocks [illegible] all surrounding objects in mourning. Hence the inquiry, is there no healing balm, no consolation, no bright side to death, no light sufficient to dispel the darkness of this gloomy vale? Is it possible that our heavenly Father has passed by this dark place in earth, which has caused so much weeping, sorrowing, and fearful forebodings? Ah! never. Christ our Lord has walked through this impenetrable darkness, and left an ever burning, brilliant lamp to cheer the pilgrim. The friends will find much consolation in the following beautiful lines, composed by a Sister for this occasion:—

One we fondly cherished sleepeth,
Rudely from our bosom torn;
Now the grave our treasure keepeth
Till the resurrection morn.

Hushed are now her tones of gladness,
Pallid her once beaming brow;
Shrouded is our home in sadness,
And our tears in sorrow flow.

Cheering is the promise given,
"Thy loved ones shall live again;"
And the tomb shall soon be riven
Where her lovely form has lain.

With what gladness we'll behold her,
Waking in immortal bloom;
In our arms once more enfold her,
In our bright, eternal home.

W. P.

Scalded to death, Dec. 4th, 1861, Mary J., daughter of Daniel and Isabella Fowler of Bancroft, (Middlefield Switch) Mass., aged fifteen years.

She went to her work in the morning as usual, and about two o'clock she accidentally fell into a vat of boiling water, used for bleaching, boiled by twenty-five pounds of steam, and though scalded in a frightful manner, she lived twelve hours, had her senses, and told her mother she would tell them how it happened when she got well. She did not complain. Young Mary was a good girl, and would often welcome the way-worn pilgrim to her father's house, (her parents are Adventists.) Her father, with too many others, has been on the back ground, and Mary was deeply interested in his spiritual welfare; and I pray this dreadful providence may awake in them a deeper interest than ever before, and I hope the children will follow her example in prayer and good living, and meet her on the other shore.

The writer improved the solemn occasion before a large and deeply feeling audience, from 1 Thess. 4: 13, 14. Bro. and Sr. Fowler, I expect to greet your dear Mary in the morning of the resurrection. Will you meet us there? Will the children meet us there, where no tears, no sighs, no groans are uttered, but all is fair?

When Mary fell into the fatal tub, she was singing joyfully—

"You pray for me, and I'll pray for you,
And that is the way we christians do."

Paris papers assert that the British Government, in answer to petitions from the manufacturing districts, stated that the cotton ports would be opened by Feb. at least.

Paris, Dec. 8. Several French journals say France will remain neutral in the event of a war between England and America.

The Debats editorially states that France has no interest to weaken the power of the United States, and that French commerce will gain enormously by the maintenance of neutrality.

Portsmouth, Dec. 8th. The Hero, 85 guns, has received sailing orders, and is expected to leave to-day for North America. Yesterday the Admiralty advertised for three more large steamships for the immediate transport of troops.

Hamburg, Dec. 8th. The impression prevails in Hanse towns that the blockade of the South will soon be broken by England. Prices of cotton continue to fall.

It is reported that 10,000 troops will be sent to British North America immediately.

The greatest activity has prevailed since Saturday last at the Tower of London, where the whole of the workmen and laborers employed in the various departments have been engaged from an early hour in the morning until a late hour at night in packing up fire-arms and all kinds of articles necessary for active service abroad.

The militia immediately available in Canada may be stated at 30,000, which may be increased to 200,000.

It is reported that the Government will charter the City of New York, as well as the new steamers coming round from Glasgow.

FRANCE.

The Emperor will probably send two frigates to reinforce the French fleet in the American waters.

ITALY.

The debate on the Roman question was resumed to-day. Signor Buoncompagni argued that it was still necessary to act with France and Italy. He said he would go to Venice when she had 300,000 men, and then Rome might be obtained.

PRUSSIA.

The election of members for the Chamber of Deputies took place on the 6th throughout the kingdom, with results in favor of the liberal party.

INDIA.

The cholera was still raging in Cabool, though not so violently. Victims of the disease were said to number fifty daily.

Gen Scott is a passenger in the Arago. His health is much improved.

THREE DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the arrival of the steamship Persia, we have news from Liverpool to the 15th inst.

Prince Albert expired at noon on Sunday 15th inst., of gastric fever.

The Persia, with 1100 troops on board, is bound for the River du Loupe or Bic.

It has been suggested to shipowners to instruct captains of outward bound vessels to signalize any English vessels that war with America is probable. This suggestion is strongly approved by underwriters.

The Australasian sailed from Liverpool on the 13th with troops for Canada.

The 1st division, 10th brigade garrison artillery embarked in the Niagara for Halifax.

The Momento of Turin warns England against bringing on a war with America, as France would take advantage of it to interfere in the East.

Austrian papers state that fears are entertained at Vienna that war between England and America would remove the only obstacle in Europe against French ambition, and that France would begin war against Germany.

DOMESTIC NEWS.

New York, Dec. [illegible] The Herald editorially says, according to our latest advices from Washington, all apprehensions of a rupture with England upon the late affair of the Trent may be dismissed. Our Cabinet, we are informed, are looking to the absorbing and paramount issue of the suppression of this Southern rebellion. They will yield to the present demand of England, as the conditions of her neutrality, even if these demands involve the restoration of Mason and Slidell to the protection of the British flag and a disavowal of an apology for their seizure by Capt. Wilkes.

New York, Dec. [illegible] The Tribune learns that among the papers transmitted to the Senate, Thursday, concerning Mexican affairs, was a project of a treaty with Mexico, the provisions of which are of such importance that it is thought it would, if confirmed, lead to a withdrawal of England and France from the Spanish alliance.

It provides that our Government shall pay $11,000,000 to Mexico, to be applied to the satisfaction of English and French creditors, and for a grant to the United States of commercial privileges, and for the adjustment of our outstanding debts and right of transit across Mexican territory for troops and munitions of war. It is thought that the treaty will be speedily confirmed and sent at once to Vera Cruz.

It is asserted that the fire at Charleston was set by some members of an Irish regiment which had mutinied in consequence of the harsh treatment of Col. Corcoran.

The Toronto Leader says a hundred thousand volunteers will be in arms in Canada before the dawn of spring, and that twenty-five thousand regulars will be ready to support them.

The Victories. Last week went out very well. Gen. Pope's successes in Western Missouri give assurance that he will soon clear his section of the rebel hordes, and pay his way as he goes. In two days he bags 1600 rebels, nearly a thousand horses, sixty wagons heavily loaded with valuable supplies, with a quantity of tents, baggage, &c. He was within a few days' march of Price's army, and will undoubtedly defeat it if he can catch it. Gen. Pope is the officer who has so successfully administered affairs in Northern Missouri during the summer.

The operations of Gen. McCall on Friday, though not of the first magnitude, were admirable in quality and result. It was about the first time in that quarter that a serious collision with the enemy has given us an easy and decisive victory. The forces were about equal, and after a fight of an hour and a half, the fierce South Carolinians, Alabamians &c., were completely routed, leaving behind them sixty killed and nineteen wounded, and more equipments and clothing than our troops could bring away. This affair will have an excellent effect. Gen. Ord was the officer immediately in command.—Boston Journal.

The English, French and American Navies.—A short time since the official statistics of the English navy gave 84,000 sailors, 356 captains, and 1700 lieutenants, while the French returns enumerated 30,000 sailors and 257 captains. The number of guns in the British navy is not far from 12,000. England has 432 steam vessels of war, including 53 ships of the line, 40 frigates, 98 sloops, and 189 gunboats. She has also attached to her navy 128 sailing vessels, including 10 ships of the line and 17 frigates, besides 54 sailing vessels now building, making a grand total of 614 steaming and sailing vessels now effective. There are about 100 more which could be fitted up in a short time.

France has 265 steamers and 180 sailing vessels—total 445, including 40 ships of the line and 61 frigates. The number of guns in the French navy is 8122.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his report just transmitted to Congress, states that we have 264 vessels, 2557 guns, and 22,000 seamen, but he includes in his list receiving ships and ships of the line that have been on the stocks since 1818. The following table gives such war vessels as are afloat or are in course of advancing preparation for service, nor does it include the steamships and transports of the regular navy or those chartered by the government for the emergency of the war. Steam vessels 131, with 1055 guns; sailing vessels 82, with 837 guns, total 213 vessels and 1892 guns.

To Bro. John T. Ongley.

Dear Brother,—As you are often laboring in Ohio, could you not make it convenient to go to Marion, Marion Co., and call on Bro. [illegible] Camp, and appoint a meeting? There are a few believers in the truths we advocate, and a number searching for the truth. They want to hear our sentiments. They have written to me to come, but I cannot do so now. I found them while on my way here. You would have no difficulty in organizing a church there. They will aid all they can in defraying your expenses. I feel interested in them, and I hope you or some other of our able brethren will go that way.

Your Bro., T. W. Smith, Evangelist.

Let us have a grand rally, as in former days. Elder S. S. Garvin will make arrangements. Friends, on arrival, will call on him for directions.

For the Crisis.

Conscience and Memory.

BY VESTA N. CUDWORTH.

Roll back the leaves! roll back the leaves of memory's record stern,
How readest thou? do past misdeeds thy trusty conscience burn?
Let conscience speak! ah! heed it now, lest o'er her downy lip
The iron pass, and, seared by sin, no more to thee she'll speak.

Roll back the leaves! roll back the leaves, some promise may perchance
Have long ago been made by thee, causing the heart to dance;
The widow's heart to sing for joy, long since forgotten too,
While darker o'er the orphan boy rolled on the tide of woe.

Roll back the leaves! roll back the leaves, e'en to the narrow grave,
That opened wide to take the form thou wouldst have died to save;
Let mem'ry now bring back to thee, causing sad tears to start,
That careless act, that cruel word, which broke that loving heart.

Roll back the leaves! roll back the leaves, for even the darkest crime
May now be cancelled; Jesus' blood can wash out every stain;
But, oh, beware! lest a dark train unheeded follow thee,
Where conscience must be heard again, and memory will not flee.

Roll back the leaves once more, I pray, examine every page,
Be faithful now, for never stains of sin fade out by age;
Thou'lt want a home when the reapers come, bringing the harvest sheaves—
Then haste! for you've no time to waste—roll back, roll back the leaves!

Roll back the leaves! roll back the leaves, erase that cruel rage;
That base complaint, imprest so faint, has marred the brightest page;
A leaf unstained by one dark line
Remains,—oh! write with care,
Then happy memories shall be thine,
Instead of dark despair.

For the Crisis.

The First Fruits—144,000.

BY D. TAYLOR.

Sacrifices are supposed to have taken place from the fatal transgression of our first parents in the garden of Eden, intended to typify the grand sacrifice of our Savior upon the cross for the sins of mankind; who is therefore said to be slain from the foundation of the world.—Rev. 13: 8. When Cain, the eldest son of Adam, was born, his mother seems to have imagined him the person promised who should destroy the head, the power of the Devil. When grown up, he applied himself to cultivate the ground, as his brother Abel did to the feeding of flocks. When Abel was grown up, he, by faith in the divine appointment, and in the prefigured Messiah, chose a victim out of the first-born of his flock, to be slain for his sins. Cain offered his first-fruits of the ground an offering unto the Lord. And the Lord had respect unto Abel, and to his offering. Cain having offered his oblation with an unbelieving heart, (for if Cain imagined, as his mother did, that he was the promised seed, he looked not for another,) God did not show any respect to it by the descent of fire from heaven, or any such similar token as he did to Abel's. "By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, God testifying of his gifts." And Cain was wroth and slew his brother, because his offering was rejected, and Abel's accepted. The information that Adam received in the garden of Eden, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, after God had rejected Cain, and Abel was dead, was handed down to his posterity; and those that believed in the promised seed died in the faith, and were the first-fruits unto God, in the faith of the Son of God, from among men.

God raised up Enoch, a prophet, six hundred and twenty-two years after the creation, who preached the faith three hundred years. Adam lived with Enoch three hundred and eight years, and heard him prophesy the second coming of Jesus Christ to judge the world, and died fifty-seven years before Enoch was translated. Methuselah was born two hundred and forty-three years before Adam died, and lived till the year of the flood, which was on the 17th day of the second month of 1656 from the creation. The records from Adam to Noah are those of the first-born of families, set apart as a type of Christ, who is the first-born of every creature, and the first begotten from the dead, who is dignified above all creatures, and hath all power, authority, and fullness. He is the preserver of his Father's name, and the sanctifier of his people.—Col. 1: 15–18, Rev. 1: 5.

The first-born represents the saints who are set apart to the service of God, and are redeemed by the death of Christ, the Lamb of God. Heb. 12: 22–24. They are called the first-fruits unto God, redeemed from among men. Rev. 14: 4. They were the first in time and order, and none ever lived to such an advanced age as those before the flood. They were prepared by a long experience for the Lord as a wave-offering at the time the Lamb was sacrificed. Lev. 23: 11, 12. And the first of the first-fruits. Ex. 23: 19. In the dispensation of the fullness of times, the Son of God appears a mediator of the New Covenant, and his blood sealed this covenant and brought him again from the dead. Heb. 13: 20. And likewise those that arose after him, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many. Matt. 27: 52, 53. By his blood he was to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound. Isa. 61: 1, Luke 4: 18. "As for thee, also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water."—Zech. 9: 11. The flood did not disturb those bodies in the pit, or prison. Job calls the grave a prison: "There the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest. There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor. The small and the great are there; and the servant is free from his master."—Job. 3: 17–19. Jesus was a prisoner there three days and nights. Isa. 53: 8, Ps. 42: 8. He was loosed from prison, and came forth a conqueror over death. "I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant of the people . . . that thou mayest say to the prisoners, Go forth; to them that are in darkness, shew yourselves. They shall feed in the ways, and their pastures shall be in all high places. They shall not hunger nor thirst, (therefore are immortal); neither shall the heat nor sun smite them: for he that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall he guide them. And I will make all my mountains a way, and my highways shall be exalted. Behold, these shall come from far; and, lo, these from the north and from the west; and these from the land of Sinim."—Isa. 49: 8–12.

When Isaiah's prisoners came out of their graves, they appeared unto many. Matt. 27: 53. Peter says, "Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead."—Acts 10: 41. Peter saw the bodies of the saints which slept, and came out of their graves after Christ's resurrection, and went into the holy city. He says Christ was "put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit; by which also" [by denotes the agent, cause, or means of any thing; also means, in like manner; so Christ was quickened or made alive by the Spirit, and] "he went and preached" or proclaimed liberty "unto the spirits in prison; which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah while the ark was a preparing."—1 Pet. 3: 18–20. Isaiah says these prisoners shall come from far, and from the north, and from the west.

Our Lord arose from Joseph's tomb at Jerusalem; and north from Jerusalem is Mesopotamia, the first residence of mankind, both before and after the flood. Peter and Isaiah agree in their testimony concerning these prisoners that were set at liberty through the blood of the everlasting covenant. And Paul and Peter agree that this covenant "was confirmed before of God in Christ," before the promise was made to Abraham. Gal. 3: 17, 1 Pet. 1: 19, 20. For Abraham was born two hundred and ninety-two years after the flood. And Abraham's posterity, or "Israel, was holiness unto the Lord, and the first-fruits of his increase," (after the flood). Jer. 2: 3. Jesus Christ is the Mediator of the New Covenant which was made before Abraham. The old covenant that was made with Abraham's posterity, with an increase, passed away. Paul says, "But ye are come unto Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels; to the general assembly and church of the first-born, [first in time, and first in resurrection after Christ] which are written in heaven, and to God the Judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the New Covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel" ['s sacrifice].—Heb. 12: 22–24. "Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature; . . . and he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence."—Col. 1: 15 18, Rev. 1: 5.

John saw in vision the church of the first-born, and the Lamb on Mount Sion, which were redeemed from the earth; and the number was 144,000—the first-fruits unto the Lamb by a resurrection from the dead to immortality. Jesus said, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, . . . the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live."—John 5: 25. "These are they which were not defiled with women [or the daughters of men]; for they are virgins." They were perfect in their generation, as Noah was perfect in his generation; the husband of one wife. Out of God's order, Cain's posterity practiced polygamy. Gen. 4: 23. And the daughters of men, or Cain, became the wives of the sons of God.—Gen. 6: 2. And "Adam . . . was the son of God" (Luke 3: 38), and his sons were called the sons of God. These were ripened by a long life and experience, the first of the fruits of this world unto God from among men, redeemed from the earth by the blood of the covenant. They were made like unto the angels in the resurrection, to die no more. "These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." "When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things."—Eph. 4: 8–10, Ps. 68: 18. He has fulfilled the type of the Lamb and the wave-offering. The high priest "shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you; on the morrow after the Sabbath."—Lev. 23: 11. "And when the Sabbath was past," the women "very early in the morning, the first day of the week" . . . came unto the sepulchre" and found he had "risen from the dead."—Mark 16: 1, Matt. 28: 1, John 20: 1. And "he showed himself alive after his passion, by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God."—Acts 1: 3. And "he was seen of above five hundred brethren at once"; and all of the Apostles.

And Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, must receive his information of the Lord concerning Enoch's prophesying of his second coming, "with ten thousands of his saints, to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him." This was Enoch's preaching to the world, from Adam to the flood, for Adam heard it, and none had died but Abel. Enoch lived sixty-five years before he came into a close walk with God; and by his obedience to God he preached the faith and warned the ungodly, and by his faithfulness was translated, and never tasted death. God made known unto Enoch, as he has "unto us, the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself: that in the dispensation of the fullness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him."—Eph. 1: 9, 10. It is evident from these Scriptures that some of Enoch's converts were sometime disobedient, while the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, but at last submitted to God, and died in the faith. And Methuselah might be one of them, for he died only a few days before the flood came upon the earth. And those that arose after Christ, it is evident that they followed him up into heaven, from these Scriptures:—Jude 14: 15, Ps. 68: 18, Zech. 14: 5, Heb. 12: 22–25, Rev. 14: 1–6, Eph. 1: 10, and 4: 8–10. For this purpose Christ came to lay down his life, and to take it again, and to proclaim liberty to these captives and redeem them from the earth or grave, and ascend on high with them.

When Jesus Christ arose from the dead he rose a king on the holy hill of Zion, Ps. 2: 7. The decree had gone forth, and his resurrection fulfilled it. "But God raised him from the dead; and he was seen many days of them which came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, who are his witnesses unto the people. And we declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second psalm, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee."—Acts 13: 33.

God cut off the chariot, the horse, and the battle bow from Jerusalem, and not a war was known in the whole world at the time of Christ's birth. "He shall speak peace unto the heathen; and his dominion shall be from sea to sea (the Mediterranean to the Euxine or Black sea), and from the river (Euphrates) even to the ends of the earth" [or the shores of those seas, as some writers say]. He exercised his authority to fulfill his purpose, and gather his multitude of captives between those seas and the river Euphrates, where mankind first resided, in the beginning of this world; and ascended unto the Father, and presented them "as a chaste virgin" unto God, the first-fruit from among men. These men had been trained in the service of God almost a thousand years, for none ever lived to such an age that were born after the flood. They were fitted purposely for the Lamb of God, to follow him whithersoever he goeth, and will come with him when he comes to judge the world. "And in their mouth was found no guile; for they are without fault before the throne of God."

When he ascended to his Father, all heaven was moved with a song of triumph to receive their king. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. Who is this King of glory? The Lord of hosts, he is the King of glory." Ps. 24: 9, 10. He had gained the keys of death and hell. "I am he that liveth and was dead; and, behold, I am alive forevermore. Amen."—Rev. 1: 18. "Sing, O heavens; and be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains; for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will have mercy on his afflicted."—Isa. 49: 13. John says, "I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder; and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps; and they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders; and no man could sing that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth."—Rev. 14: 2, 3. "But Zion said, The Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me." The Lord said, "Yet will I not forget thee. Behold, I have graven thee upon the palms of my hands."—Isa 49: 14–16. A sad and afflicted company of about one hundred and twenty disciples were gathered together in an upper room at Jerusalem, and continued with one accord in prayer and supplication; and in ten days after Jesus ascended, "suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a mighty rushing wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them; and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance." They all had joy in the Spirit, praising God, and having favor with all the people. They ate their meat with gladness and singleness of heart. And the sound of the gospel went out from Jerusalem into every nation under heaven. For "there were dwelling at Jerusalem, Jews, devout men, out of every nation under heaven. . . . Parthians, and Medes, and Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia, and in Judea, and Cappadocia, in Pontus, and Asia, Phrygia, and Pamphylia, in Egypt, and in the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and strangers of Rome. Jews and proselytes, Cretes and Arabians," heard "them speak in" their "tongues the wonderful works of God. . . . And they that gladly received his word were baptized. . . And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved." There was joy in heaven and on earth, when Jesus sat down on the throne at the right of his Father, "to be a Prince and a Savior, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins."—Acts 2: 5–31.

BRN. GRANT AND MORGAN:—By the request of several of our old brethren and sisters, who used to hear the old Advent hymns that we sung forty years ago, I send you the Grand Exhibition Hymn. Hope you will insert it in your paper.

Yours in hope, TIMOTHY COLE.

General Exhibition.

Attend, my friends and neighbors,
A moment at my call,
I have an invitation,
I give it unto all;
A splendid exhibition
Is shortly to begin,
I'll give you a description,
And urge you to come in.

Almost six thousand seasons,
With unexampled cost,
This feast has been preparing—
There has no time been lost;
'Twill shortly now be ready,
O then do not delay,
Be sure to gain admittance,
And oh, apply to-day.

A theatre spacious,
Twelve thousand furlongs square,
Stands on its twelve foundations,
Of precious jewels rare;
Its colors bright and sparkling,
Of variegated hue,
Pour forth a flood of splendor
To the astonish'd view.

Twelve gates of pearls unbroken
Its spacious sides adorn,
Twelve shining angels waiting,
All beauteous as the morn;
The ceiling is of jasper,
The floor of purest gold;
O be prepared to view it,
Its glories can't be told.

The scene that's to be acted
All others will excel,
The number of the actors
No human tongue can tell;
Kings, Princes, Priests and Prophets,
And if you ask their dress,
'Tis white as snow in Lebanon,*
The robe of righteousness.

The music is most charming,
The song forever new,
The guests have long been learning
To sound the notes most true;
The whole will be directed
By nature's great I AM,
It is a sacred drama,
The marriage of the Lamb.

They need no light of candles,
Nor yet the silver moon,
The sun will be confounded
When at the brightest noon;
The glory of the bridegroom
Shall far outvie his rays,
Throughout the spacious building,
In one unclouded blaze.

No indolent spectators
Within these walls appear,
For those who gain admittance,
Will all be actors here;
The happy guests united
Will form the glorious bride,
No length of time divides them,
And pleasures ne'er subside.

Ask you of the condition,
And who may take a share?
The King makes free provision,
And all are welcome here;
The king, the lord, the debtor,
The bondman and the slave,
Do but apply in season,
Admittance you shall have.

For the Crisis.

Extracts from H. Munger.

The following is a part of a letter just received from one of our old neighbors, who used to believe in the doctrines of the Advent; but, giving heed to the last day deceptions, got away from the light, and was induced to go South about two years ago. This, with other letters, shows that God has suffered a chastisement for their good, which seems to restore, in a measure, the lost confidence in his word:—

"The time is hasting greatly when the rich at the south will be no better off than the poor; and I am thankful that we are in a land flowing with milk and honey. You ask me when I am coming east. I answer, I do not know. We are as far north as we wish to be this winter, except a desire to see our friends at the east. We feel the change of climate in coming north; have had colds, and our blood is thin; and the air is damp and chilly here compared with Georgia. We needed rest, and are enjoying it, with exercise enough to give us good appetites.

The war department brings a great deal of money to this place. We are living in an eventful time, and I am looking at the things that are coming on the earth. This war will not cease till the producing cause is removed. The South held two public fasts before I left, and engaged God on their side by offering their prayers to him in the name of Jesus, to protect and perpetuate the institution of slavery, which he had ordained, and victory over the vile abolitionists of the north, who are trying to take from them their God-given rights.

Slavery is the cause of this war, and God will make the wrath of man to praise him, for he hath set judgment in the earth. And judgment must first begin at the house of God, the temple at Jerusalem, and the buyers and sellers that make up this den of thieves, and overthrow the tables of money changers, and the seats of them that sell the harmless ones, and give them a tremendous whipping with a scourge. Then will be fulfilled that which was spoken by Obediah the prophet, viz: 'As thou hast done, it shall be done unto thee: thy reward shall return upon thine own head.' Then shall mankind learn that righteousness and justice are more to be desired than great riches gained by unrewarded toil. J. O."

For the Crisis.

Confession.—No. 2.

It will be remembered by some of the brethren, that in opposing church organization, I have made use of some positive expressions, as,—"if I ever join an organized church, it shall be some one that already exists." Of this I heartily repent, for I think that there is gospel order, and that I have found it.

Again, I have thought and said, that the brethren were giving way to temptation of the devil in organizing, and felt sorry that they did so; and, though I do not believe that the right plan has in every case been adopted, yet I think that many have been laboring for the right. I wish to say to the brethren that I design, the Lord willing, as soon as convenient, to visit those places where I have preached against organic order, and give them my present views on the subject. Those that wish to have me do so, will do me a favor to write and let me know it. I have a large field here and plenty of preaching to do, but I am willing to make amends for what I may have done wrong, and present some arguments in favor of what now appears to me to be right. I do not take this position to gain the favor, nor shun the frowns of any, but to glorify God and benefit the church.

The New Theology.

A good deal has been printed within a few months past, about the "new theology" taught in a book published in England with the title of "Essays and Reviews." As only a few of our readers will find time to examine the book, while all will wish to have some general idea of its contents, we copy the following from the report of a committee appointed to consider the subject-matter of the obnoxious volume. The report was presented by Archdeacon George Anthony Denison:—Millennial Harbinger.

"The book committed to our examination consists of seven 'Essays and Reviews,' six of which were by clergymen of the United Church of England and Ireland.

"We have carefully examined the book, and we consider the following to be its leading principles:

"1. That the present advanced knowledge possessed by the world in its 'manhood' is the standard whereby the educated intellect of the individual man, guided and governed by conscience, is to measure the truth of the Bible.

"2. That where the Bible is assumed to be at variance with the conclusions of such educated intellect, the Bible must be taken in such cases to have no divine authority, but to be only 'a human utterance.'

"3. That the principles of interpretation of the Bible hitherto universally received in the Christian Church are untenable, and that new principles of interpretation must now be substituted if the credit and authority of the Holy Scriptures are to be maintained.

"We find that,

"1. In many parts of the volume statements and doctrines of the Holy Scriptures are denied, called into question, or disparaged; for example:

"(a) 'The Reality of Miracles,' including the idea of Creation as presented to us in the Bible.

"(b) 'Predictive Prophecy,' especially predictions concerning the Incarnation, person, and offices of our Lord.

"(c) 'The descent of all mankind from Adam.'

"(d) 'The Fall of Man and Original sin.'

"(e) 'The Divine Command to sacrifice Isaac.'

"(f) 'The Incarnation of Our Lord.

"(g) 'Salvation through the blood of Christ.'

"(h) 'The Personality of the Holy Spirit.'

"(i) 'Special or Supernatural Inspiration.'

"(k) 'Historical facts of the Old Testament, including some referred to by our blessed Lord himself.'

"2. It is urged that many passages of the Holy Scriptures may be understood and explained upon the principle called 'ideology;' by which is meant that the reader is at liberty to accept the idea of characters and facts described in the Holy Scriptures, instead of believing in the reality of those characters and facts.

"[illegible] is maintained that the creeds of [illegible] Church, whether regarded as confessions of faith or as 'instruments for the interpretations of Scriptures' may now be put aside as no longer suitable to the present advanced intellectual condition of the world.

"4. Liberty is claimed for the clergy and candidates for holy orders to subscribe articles of religion, and to use formularies in public worship, without believing them according to their plain and natural meaning.

"5. Attempts are made to separate Christian holiness of life from Christian doctrine.

"We notice in many parts of the volume the absence of that spirit of humility and reverence with which human reason ought ever to approach the study of divine truth; we notice also a confusion of the dictates of the natural conscience with Divine grace, and in some places a substitution of those dictates for Divine grace.

"It appears to us that, while the professed intention of the volume is the 'free handling in a becoming spirit, of religious subjects, the general tendency and effect of the volume is unduly to exalt the authority of human reason, to lower the authority of Revelation in regard to things Divine and spiritual, to unsettle faith, and to consign the reader to a hopeless scepticism."

STRENGTH OF A KIND WORD.—Some people are very apt to use harsh, angry words, perhaps because they think they will be obeyed more promptly. They talk loud, swear and storm, though after all they are only laughed at; their orders are forgot, and their ill temper is remembered. How strong is a kind word! It will do what the harsh word or even blow cannot do; it will subdue the stubborn will, relax the frown, and work wonders. Even the dog, the cat, or the horse, though they do not know what you say, can tell when you speak a kind word to them. A man was one day driving a cart along the street. The horse was drawing a heavy load, and did not turn as the man wished him. The man was in ill-temper, and beat the horse; the horse reared and plunged, but he either did not or would not go in the right way. Another man who was with the cart, went up to the horse, and patted him on the neck, and called him kindly by his name. The horse turned his head and fixed his large eyes on the man as though he would say, "I will do anything for you because you are kind to me!" and bending his broad chest against the load, turned the cart down the narrow lane, and trotted on briskly as though the load was a plaything. Oh, how strong is a kind word!

POWER OF THE HUMAN EYE.—George Pitt, afterward Lord Rivers, declared that he could tame the most furious animal by looking at it steadily. Lord Spencer said, "Well, there is a mastiff in the court-yard here which is the terror of the neighborhood; will you try your power on him?" Pitt agreed to do so, and the company descended to the court-yard. A servant held the mastiff by a chain. Pitt knelt down a short distance from the animal and stared him sternly in the face. They all shuddered. At a signal given the mastiff was let loose, and rushed furiously toward Pitt; then suddenly checked his pace, seemed confounded, and leaping over Pitt's head, ran away, and was not seen for many hours after. During one of my visits to Italy, while I was walking a little before my carriage, on the road near Vienna, I perceived two huge dogs bounding toward me. I recollected what Pitt had done, and trembling from head to foot, I yet had resolution enough to stand quite still and eye them with a fixed look. They gradually relaxed their speed from a gallop to a trot, came up to me, stopped for a moment, and went back again.—Rogers' Table Talk.

CHURCHES IN BOSTON.—We have taken pains to ascertain, and find that there are in all the city twenty-three Unitarian congregations; Baptist, fourteen; Free-Will Baptist, one; Trinitarian Congregational, twelve; Episcopal, eleven; Methodist and Methodist Episcopal, twelve; Presbyterian, four; Friends, one; Roman Catholic, twelve; Second Advent, two; Union Evangelical, one; Universalist, five. Besides these, are the West church, Congregational, not designated, and a Christian church—in all, ninety-eight.—Watchman.

SCOLDING.—A scolding person cannot govern. What makes people scold? Because they cannot govern themselves. How, then, can they govern others? Those who govern well are generally calm; they are prompt and resolute, but steady and mild.

Hygiene.

"This is for your health."—PAUL.

Night Air.

Much that is untrue has been communicated to the public as to the healthfulness and unhealthfulness of night-air, for want of enlarged information and opportunities of observation on the part of the writers. There is no one universal, safe rule; what is a healthful practice in one latitude, or one locality, or one season, may be deadly in another. Peculiarity of constitution modifies all rules on this subject. The only safe plan, therefore, is, to enunciate certain well-established principles, which the intelligent reader must wisely apply in practice.

There is nothing necessarily injurious in the night-air, even to feeble, delicate persons, in our latitude, or any season of the year, provided a hot meal has been taken, and the person exercises with sufficient activity to be comfortably warm, and keep off a feeling of fatigue; but as soon as the exercise ceases, shelter should be taken in a house. With these precautions, exposure to the night-air is a positive good to sick and well, as a very general rule, because the in-door air is the out-door air mixed with various in-door sources of impurity.

Except in the miasmatic season of the year, which, in latitudes north of thirty-five, may be embraced between the first days of August and October, most persons may sleep with impunity, and even with advantage, in the open air, with the sky for a canopy, if there is enough covering to keep the body comfortably warm. Whether in sleeping in a house, the windows should be open or closed, depends on the part of the house occupied, and on the season of the year. Many a life is annually lost by not taking these points into account. In our book on "SLEEP," the laws of miasm are clearly stated; and this can not be done too often, nor can they be too well or too generally understood, because it is a subject of vital importance to every human being.

When it is cool enough to keep fires in the house all day, and until the nights begin to get cool in the autumn, it is far better for both sick and well, whether sleeping in the cellar or in the garret, to have an abundant supply of out-door air coming into the chamber from windows let down at the top, and raised from the bottom, more or less, according to the size of the room, the number occupying it, and the season of the year; always, however, arranging that a draught of air should not be on the sleeper.

In the miasmatic season, a discrimination should be made, and a sound judgment should be exercised. The general rule is, that during August and September, when the days are hot and the nights are cool, in flat localities, along watercourses, and near lakes and ponds, persons sleeping on the ground-floor should close all the outer doors and windows, but in the upper stories the windows may be opened, and the inner doors closed, because the cold keeps the miasm, the disease-engendering agency, near the earth's surface, within the first five or six feet, and lower in proportion to the greater coolness; as you ascend above that point, the air becomes purer and purer. Some of this malignant air will enter the chamber through the crevices of the windows and doors, although they may be closed, but it enters in such small quantities that it is immediately warmed, for it is ordinarily ten degrees warmer in-doors than without, at night, in the autumn; and the greater warmth rarefies the incoming air, and sends it at once to the ceiling, where it cannot be breathed. As this bad air is below the upper stories of a building the windows may be opened; yet, as inside the building, it seeks the upper portions, the inner doors should be closed, so that it should be admitted in as small quantities as possible. The general fact is this: miasm and carbonic acid gas mingled with the air we breathe, will cause death in a month, or in a minute, according to the concentration, according to the strength of the mixture. Cold causes them both to seek the surface of the earth or the floor; hence in a cold chamber the nearer the ceiling you sleep the purer the air is; but in a warm chamber the purest air is on the floor, as the warmth sends the poisonous gases to the ceiling. At the first glance all this appears vexatiously complex; but when the natural law on the subject is clearly perceived, it is beautifully simple, as all God's laws are, and as wise and beneficent as they are beautiful and clear.—Hall's Journal of Health.

"How to Prevent Drowning."

A few months since I was bathing in a river, and very suddenly and unexpectedly went beyond my depth. The current was very rapid, and I was entirely alone—not a person in sight. And to make the matter worse, I could not swim a stroke, having often tried to learn, but having utterly failed hitherto even to keep my head above water. I struggled a moment, trying to imitate the motions of those I had seen swim, but made no progress toward the shore, while the current swept me down, the water occasionally going quite over me. Just as I began to think I might have to stay in the water longer than my first intention, there flashed across my mind a remark made by a friend a short time before. "If you can't keep your head above water, put it under, and you can swim then, and can't sink." Under went my head, my body assumed a more horizontal position, and swimming came as natural as walking. A few vigorous strokes placed me beyond danger. My friend's suggestion had saved my life; and as I believe many cases of drowning might have been avoided by a knowledge of this fact, I give this item of my experience for the benefit of humanity. Pass it around. When a person is far from shore, the head may occasionally be thrown out to take breath.—Herald of Progress.

TO STOP BLEEDING.—Asa Kemper, of Ross County, Ohio, writes to the American Agriculturist, that bleeding from a wound on man or beast may be stopped by a mixture of wheat flour and common salt, in equal parts, bound on with a cloth. If the bleeding be profuse use a large quantity, say from one to three pints. It may be left for hours, several days if necessary. In this manner he saved the life of a horse, which was bleeding from a wounded artery; the bleeding ceased in five minutes after this application. It was left on three d[illegible] when it worked loose [illegible] moved, and the wound [illegible]
